3. A good reason for this advice; "If so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not." It should seem the many gods they called upon were considered by them but as mediators between them and the supreme God, and intercessors for them with him; for the shipmaster speaks of one God still, from whom he expected relief. To engage prayer, he suggests that the danger was very great and imminent: We are all likely to perish; there is but a step between us and death, and that just ready to be stepped. That yet there was some hope remaining that their destruction might be prevented: And we may not perish. While there is life there is hope, and while there is hope there is room for prayer. That it was God only that could effect their deliverance, and it must come from his power and his pity. If he think upon us, and act for us, we may yet be saved; and therefore to him we must look, and in him we must put our trust, when the danger is ever so imminent.

Fourthly. Jonah is found out to be the cause of the storm.

1. The mariners observed so much peculiar and uncommon, either in the storm itself or in their own distress by it, that they concluded it was a messenger of Divine justice sent to arrest some one of them that were in that ship, as having been guilty of some enormous crime; judging as the barbarous people, Acts xxviii. 4, "No doubt one of us is a murderer," or guilty of sacrilege, or perjury, or the like, who is thus pursued by the vengeance of the sea, and it is for his sake that we all suffer. Even the light of nature teaches that in extraordinary judgments the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against some extraordinary sins and sinners. Whatever evil is upon us at any time, we must conclude there is a cause for it; there is evil done by us, or else this evil would not be upon us; there is a ground for God's controversy.

2. They determined to refer it to the lot, which of them was the criminal that had occasioned this storm. "Let us cast lots, that we may know for whose cause this evil is upon us." None of them suspected himself, or said, "Is it I? Lord, is it I?" but they suspected one another, and would find out the man. Note, It is a desirable thing, when any evil is upon us, to know for what cause it is upon us, that what is amiss may be amended, and, the grievance being redressed, the grief may be removed; and in order to this we must look up to heaven, and pray, Lord, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. That which I see not, teach thou me. These mariners desired to know the person that was the dead weight in their ship, the accursed thing, that that one man might die for the people, and that the whole ship might not be lost, and that was not only expedient, but highly just. In order to this they cast lots, by which they appealed to the judgment of God, "to whom all hearts are open, and from whom no secret is hid;" agreeing to acquiesce in his discovery and determination, and to take that for true which the lot spoke; for they knew by the light of nature what the Scripture tells us, that "the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposal thereof is of the Lord." Even the heathen looked upon the casting of lots to be a sacred thing, and to be done with seriousness and solemnity, and not to be made a sport of. It is a shame for Christians if they have not a like reverence for an appeal to providence.

3. The lot fell upon Jonah, who could have saved them this trouble if he would but have told them, what his own conscience told him, "Thou art the man." But, as it is usual with criminals, he never confesseth till he finds he cannot help it, till "the lot falls upon him." We may suppose there were those in the ship who, upon other accounts, were greater sinners than Jonah, and he is the man that the tempest pursues, and that the lot pitcheth upon; for it is his own child, his own servant, that the parent, that the master, corrects if they do amiss; others that offend he leaves to the law. The storm is sent after Jonah, because God has work for him to do, and it is sent to fetch him back to it. Note, God has many ways of bringing to light concealed sins and sinners, and making manifest that folly which was thought to be hid from the eyes of all living. God's right hand will find out all his servants that desert him, as well as all his enemies that have designs against him; yea, though they flee to the uttermost parts of the sea, or go down to the sides of the ship.

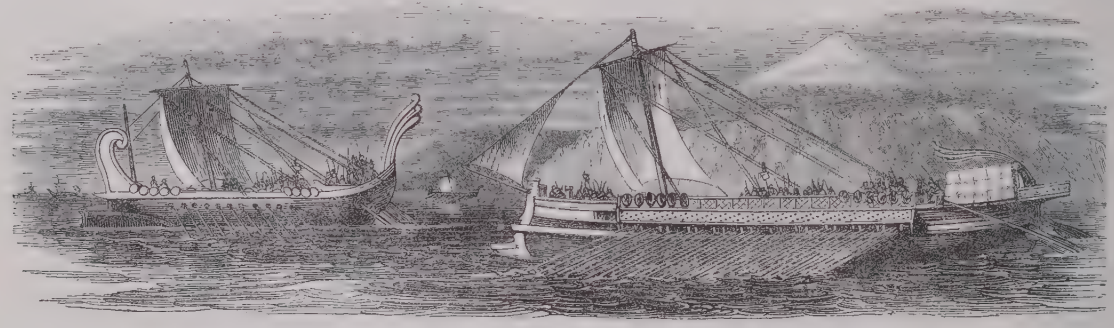
4. Jonah is hereupon brought under examination before the master and mariners. He was a stranger,—none of them could say they knew the prisoner, or had anything to lay to his charge, and therefore must extort a confession from him, and judge him out of his own mouth; and for this they needed no rack, the shipwreck they were in danger of was sufficient to frighten him, so as to make him tell the truth. Though it was discovered by the lot that he was the person for whose sake they were thus damaged and exposed, yet they did not fly outrageously upon him, as one would fear they might have done, but calmly and mildly inquired into his case. There is a compassion owing to offenders when they are discovered and convicted. They give him no hard words, but, "Tell us, we pray thee," what is the mischief? Two things they inquire of, 1st. Whether he would himself own that he was the person for whose sake the storm was sent, as the lot had intimated, "Tell us, for whose cause this evil is upon us?" Is it indeed for thy cause; and if so, for what cause? What is the offence for which thou art thus prosecuted? Perhaps the gravity and decency of Jonah's aspect and carriage made them suspect that the lot had missed its man, had missed its mark, and therefore they would not trust it, unless he would himself own his guilt; they therefore beg of him he would satisfy them in this matter. Note, Those that would find out the cause of their troubles must not only begin, but pursue, the inquiry, must descend to particulars, and accomplish a diligent search. 2nd. What his character was, both as to his calling and to his country. First. They inquire concerning his calling, "What is thine occupation?" This was a proper question to be put to a vagrant. Perhaps they suspected his calling to be such as might bring this trouble upon him. Art thou a diviner, a sorcerer, a student in the black art? hast thou been conjuring for this wind? Or, what business art thou now going on? is it like Balaam's, to curse any of God's people, and is this wind sent to stop thee? Secondly. They inquire concerning his country. One asked, "Whence camest thou?" Another, not having patience to stay for an answer to that, asked, "What is thy country?" and a third, to the same purpose, "Of what people art thou?" Art thou of the Chaldeans, that were noted for divination? or of the Arabians, that were noted for stealing? They wish to know of what country he was, that, knowing who was the god of his country, they might guess whether he was one that could do them any kindness in this storm.

5. In answer to these interrogatories Jonah makes a full discovery. 1st. Did they inquire concerning his country? he tells them he is a Hebrew, ver. 9, not only of the nation of Israel, but of their religion, which they received from their fathers. He is an Hebrew, and therefore is the more ashamed to own that he is a criminal; for the sins of Hebrews, that make such a profession of religion, and enjoy such privileges, are greater than the sins of others, and more exceeding sinful. 2nd. Did they inquire concerning his calling, "What is his occupation?" In answer to that he gives an account of his religion, for that was his calling, that was his occupation, that was it he made a business of; "I fear the Lord Jehovah," that is the God I worship, the God I pray to, even "the God of heaven," the sovereign Lord of all, that has "made the sea, and the dry land," and has the command of both. Not the god of one particular country, which they inquired after, and such as the gods were that they had been every man calling upon, but "the God of the whole earth," who, having made both the sea and the dry land, makes what work he pleaseth in both, and makes what use he pleaseth of both. This he mentions not only as condemning himself for his folly, in fleeing from the presence of this God, but as designing to bring these mariners from the worship and service of their many gods to the knowledge and obedience of the one only living and true God. When we are among those that are strangers to us we should do what we can to bring them acquainted with God, by being ready upon all occasions to own our relation to him, and our reverence for him. 3rd. Did they inquire concerning his crime, for which he is now prosecuted? he owns that he "fled from the presence of the Lord," that he was here outrunning his duty, and the storm was sent to fetch him back. We have reason to think he told them this with sorrow and shame, justifying God, and condemning himself, and intimating to the mariners what a great God Jehovah is, who could send such a messenger as this tempest was after a runagate servant.

6. We are told what impression this made upon the mariners; "The men were exceedingly afraid," and justly; for they perceive, 1st. That God is angry, even that God that made the sea and the dry land. This tempest comes from the hand of an offended justice, and therefore they have reason to fear it will go hard with them. Judgments inflicted for some particular sin have a peculiar weight and terror in them. 2nd. That God is angry with one that fears and worships him, only for once outrunning his work in a particular instance. This made them afraid for themselves: If a prophet of the Lord be thus severely punished for one offence, what will become of us that have been guilty of so many, and great, and heinous offences? If the righteous be thus scarcely saved, and for a single act of disobedience thus closely pursued, "Where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. They said to him, "Why hast thou done this?" If thou fearest the God that made the sea and the dry land, why wast thou such a fool as to think thou couldest flee from his presence? what an absurd, unaccountable thing is it! Thus he was reproved, as Abraham by Abimelech, Gen. xx. 16; for if the professors of religion do an ill thing, they must expect to hear of it from those that make no such profession. Why hast thou done this to us? so it may be taken; why hast thou involved us in the prosecution? Note, Those that commit a wilful sin know not how far the mischievous consequences of it may reach, nor what mischief may be done by it.

11 Then said they unto him, What shall we do unto thee, that the sea may be calm unto us? for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous. 12 And he said unto them, Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea; so shall the sea be calm unto you: for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you. 13 Nevertheless the men rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not: for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous against them. 14 Wherefore they cried unto the LORD, and said, We beseech thee, O LORD, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood: for thou, O LORD, hast done as it pleased thee. 15 So they took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea: and the sea ceased from her raging. 16 Then the men feared the LORD exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the LORD, and made vows. 17 Now the LORD had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah. And Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights.



ANCIENT SHIPS.

It is plain that Jonah is the man for whose sake this evil is upon them; but the discovery of him to be so was not sufficient to answer the demands of this tempest. They had found him out, but something more was to be done; for still "The sea wrought, and was tempestuous," ver. 11; and again, ver. 13, it 'grew more and more tempestuous,' so the margin reads it; for if we discover sin to be the cause of our troubles, and do not forsake it, we do but make ill worse. Therefore they go on with the prosecution.

First. They inquire of Jonah himself what he thought they must do with him; ver. 11, "What shall we do unto thee that the sea may be calm to us?" They perceive that Jonah is a prophet of the Lord, and therefore will not do any thing, no, not in his own case, without consulting him. He appears to be a delinquent, but he appears also to be a penitent, and therefore they would not insult over him, or offer him any rudeness. Note. We ought to carry it with great tenderness towards those that are overtaken in a fault, and are brought into distress by it. They would not cast him into the sea, if he could think of any other expedient by which to save the ship. Or, perhaps, thus they would shew how plain the case was, that there was no remedy but he must be thrown overboard; let him be his own judge, as he had been his own accuser, and he himself will say so. Note, When sin has raised a storm, and laid us under the tokens of God's displeasure, we are concerned to inquire what we shall do that the sea may be calm; and what shall we do? We must pray and believe when we are in a storm, and study to answer the end for which it was sent, and then the storm shall become a calm. But especially we must consider what is to be done to the sin that raised the storm; that must be discovered and penitently confessed, that must be detested, disclaimed, and utterly forsaken. What have I to do any more with it? crucify it, crucify it, for this evil it has done.

Secondly. Jonah reads his own doom; ver. 12, "Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea." He would not himself leap into the sea, but he puts himself into their hands to cast him into the sea, and assures them that then the sea would be calm, and not otherwise. He proposed this in tenderness to the mariners, that they might not suffer for his sake. "Let thy hand be upon me," saith David, 1 Chr. xxi. 17, who am guilty, let me die for my own sin, but let not the innocent suffer for it. This is the language of true penitents, who earnestly desire that none but themselves may ever smart or fare the worse for their sins and follies. He proposed it likewise in submission to the will of God, who sent this tempest in pursuit of him; and therefore judgeth himself to be cast into the sea, because to that he plainly saw God judging him, that he might not be judged of the Lord to eternal misery. Note, Those who are truly humble for sin will cheerfully submit to the will of God, even in a sentence of death itself. If Jonah sees this to be the punishment of his iniquity, he accepts it, he subjects himself to it, and justifies God in it. No matter though the flesh be destroyed, no matter how it is destroyed, so that the spirit may but be "saved in the day of the Lord Jesus," 1 Cor. v. 5. The reason he gives is, "For I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you." See how ready Jonah is to take all the guilt upon himself, and to look upon all the trouble as theirs: It is purely for my sake, who have sinned, that this tempest is upon you; therefore "cast me forth into the sea;" for,

1. I deserve it. I have wickedly departed from my God, and it is upon my account that he is angry with you; surely I am unworthy to breathe in that air which for my sake has been hurried with winds, to live in that ship which for my sake has been thus tossed; cast me into the sea after the wares which for my sake you have thrown into it. Drowning is too good for me, a single death is punishment too little for such a complicated offence.

2. Therefore there is no other way of having the sea calm. If it is I that have raised the storm, it is not casting the wares into the sea that will lay it again; no, you must cast me thither. When conscience is awakened, and a storm raised there, nothing will turn it into a calm but parting with the sin that occasioned the disturbance, and abandoning that. It is not parting with our money that will pacify conscience. No, it is the Jonah that must be thrown overboard. Jonah is herein a type of Christ, that he "gives his life a ransom for many;" but with this material difference, that the storm Jonah gave himself up to still was of his own raising, that which Christ gave himself up to still was of our raising. Yet as Jonah delivered himself up to be cast into a raging sea, that it might be calm, so did our Lord Jesus, when he died that we might live.

Thirdly. The poor mariners did what they could to save themselves from the necessity of throwing Jonah into the sea, but all in vain; ver. 10, "They rowed hard to bring the ship to the land," that if they must part with Jonah they might set him safe on shore; but they could not, all their pains were to no purpose, for the sea worked harder than they could, and tempestuous against them, so that they could by no means make the land. If they thought sometimes they had gained their point, they were presently thrown off to sea again; still their ship was overladen, their lightening it of the wares made it never the lighter as long as Jonah was in it. And besides they rowed against wind and tide, the wind of God's vengeance, the tide of his counsels; and it is in vain to contend with God, in vain to think of saving ourselves any other way but by destroying our sins. By this it appears the mariners were very loath to execute Jonah's sentence upon himself, though they knew it was for his sake that this tempest was upon them. They were thus very backward to it, partly from a dread of bringing upon themselves the guilt of blood, and partly from a compassion they could not but have for poor Jonah, as a good man, as a man in distress, as a man of sincerity. Note, The more sinners humble and abase themselves, judge and condemn themselves, the more likely they are to find pity both with God and man. The more forward Jonah was to say, Cast me into the sea, the more backward they are to do it.

Fourthly. When they found it necessary to cast Jonah into the sea, they first prayed to God that the guilt of his blood might not lie upon them, or be laid to their charge, ver. 14. When they found it in vain to row hard, they quitted their oars and went to their prayers; "Wherefore they cried unto the Lord," unto Jehovah, the true and living God, and no more to the gods many and lords many that they cried to, ver. 5. They prayed to the God of Israel, being now convinced by the providences of God concerning Jonah, and the information he had given them, that he is God alone. Having determined to cast Jonah into the sea, they first enter a protestation in the court of heaven that they do not do it willingly, much less maliciously, or with any design to be revenged upon him because it was for his sake that this tempest was upon them. No, his God forgive him as they do! But they are forced to do it se defendendo,—'in self-defence,' having no other way to save their own lives; and they do it as ministers of justice, both God and himself having sentenced him to so great a death. They therefore present a humble petition to the God whom Jonah feared, that they might not perish for his life. See,

1. What a fear they had of contracting the guilt of blood, especially the blood of one that feared God, and worshipped him, and had fellowship with him, as they perceived Jonah had, though in a single instance he had been faulty. Natural conscience cannot but have a dread of blood-guiltiness, and make men very earnest in prayer, as David was, to be delivered from it, Ps. li. 14. So they were here; "We beseech thee, O Lord, we beseech thee, lay not upon us innocent blood." They are now as earnest in praying to be saved from the peril of the sin as they were before in praying to be saved from the peril of the sea, especially because Jonah appeared to them to be no ordinary person, but a very good man, a man of God, a worshipper of the great Creator of heaven and earth, upon which account even these rude mariners conceived a veneration for him, and trembled at the thought of taking away his life. Innocent blood is precious, but saints' blood, prophets' blood, is much more precious, and so they will find to their cost that any way bring themselves under the guilt of it. The mariners saw Jonah pursued by Divine vengeance, and yet could not without horror think of being his executioners. Though his God has a controversy with him, yet, think they, "Let not our hands be upon him." The Israelites were at this time killing the prophets for doing their duty, (witness Jezebel's late persecution,) and were prodigal of their lives, which is aggravated by the tenderness these heathens had for one whom they perceived to be a prophet, though he was now out of the way of his duty.

2. What a fear they had of incurring the wrath of God. They were jealous lest he should be angry if they should be the death of Jonah; for he had said, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm;" it is at your peril if you do. Lord, say they, "Let us not perish for this man's life;" let it not be such a fatal dilemma to us; we see we must perish if we spare his life, O let us not perish for taking away his life. And their plea is good: "For thou, O Lord, hast done as it pleased thee," thou hast laid us under a necessity of doing it; the wind that pursued him, the lot that discovered him, were both under thy direction, which we are herein governed by; we are but the instruments of providence, and it is sorely against our will that we do it; but we must say, "The will of the Lord be done." Note, When we are manifestly led by providence to do things contrary to our own inclinations, and quite beyond our own intentions, it will be some satisfaction to us to be able to say, "Thou, O Lord, hast done as it pleased thee;" and if God please himself we ought to be satisfied, though he do not please us.

Fifthly. Having deprecated the guilt they dreaded, they proceeded to execution; ver. 15, "They took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea." They cast him out of their ship, out of their company, and cast him into the sea, a raging stormy sea, that cried, Give, give; surrender the traitor, or expect no peace. We may well think what confusion and amazement poor Jonah was in when he saw himself ready to be hurried into the presence of that God as a judge, whose presence as a master he was now fleeing from. Note, Those know not what ruin they run upon that run away from God. "Woe unto them, for they have fled from me." When sin is the Jonah that raises the storm, that must thus be cast forth into the sea, we must abandon it, and be the death of it, must drown that which otherwise will drown us in destruction and perdition. And if we thus, by a thorough repentance and reformation, cast our sins forth into the sea, never to recall them or return to them again, God will by pardoning mercy subdue our iniquities, and cast them into the depths of the sea too, Mic. vii. 19.

Sixthly, The throwing of Jonah into the sea immediately put an end to the storm; the sea has what she came for, and therefore rests contented, she ceaseth from her raging. It is an instance of the sovereign power of God that he can soon turn the storm into a calm, and of the equity of his government, that when the end of an affliction is answered and attained, the affliction shall presently be removed. He will not contend for ever, will not contend any longer than till we submit ourselves and give up the cause. If we turn from our sins he will soon turn from his anger.

Seventhly. The mariners were hereby more confirmed in their belief that Jonah's God was the only true God; ver. 16, "Then the men feared the Lord with a great fear," were possessed with a mighty veneration for the God of Israel, and came to a resolution that they would worship him only for the future, for there is no other God that can destroy, that can deliver after this sort. When they saw the power of God in raising and laying the tempest, when they saw his justice upon Jonah his own servant, and when they saw his goodness to them in saving them from the brink of ruin, "then they feared the Lord," Jer. v. 22. As an evidence of their fear of him they offered sacrifice to him when they came ashore again in the land of Israel; and for the present made vows that they would do so, in thankfulness for their deliverance, and to make atonement for their souls. Or, perhaps they had something yet on board which might be for a sacrifice to God immediately; or it may be meant of the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, with which God is better pleased than with that of an ox or bullock that has horns and hoofs: see Ps. cvii. 22, &c. We must take vows not only when we are in the pursuit of mercy, but, which is much more generous, when we have received mercy, as those that are still studying what we shall render.

Eighthly. Jonah's life after all is saved by a miracle, and we shall hear of him again for all this. In the midst of judgment God remembers mercy. Jonah shall be worse frightened than hurt, not so much punished for his sin as reduced to his duty. Though he flees from the presence of the Lord, and seems to fall into his avenging hands, yet God has more work for him to do, and therefore hath "prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah," ver. 17. A whale, our Saviour calls it, Mat. xii. 40; one of the largest sorts of whales, that have wider throats than others, in the belly of which has sometimes been found the dead body of a man in armour. Particular notice is taken in the history of the creation of God's creating great whales, Gen. i. 21; and the leviathan in the waters made to play therein, Ps. civ. 26. But God finds work for this leviathan, has prepared him, has numbered him, so the word is, has appointed him to be Jonah's receiver and deliverer. Note, God has command of all the creatures, and can make any of them serve his designs of mercy to his people; even the fishes of the sea, that are most from under man's cognizance, even the great whales, that are altogether from under man's government. This fish was prepared, lay ready under water close by the ship, that he might keep Jonah from sinking to the bottom, and save him alive, though he deserves to die. Let us stand still and see this salvation of the Lord, and admire his power that he could thus save a drowning man, and his pity that he would thus save one that was running from him, and had offended him. It was of the Lord's mercies that Jonah was not now consumed. The fish swallowed up Jonah, not to devour him, but to protect him; "Out of the eater comes forth meat," for Jonah was alive and well "in the belly of the fish, three days and three nights," not consumed by the heat of the animal, or suffocated for want of air. It is granted that to nature this was impossible, but not to the God of nature, with whom all things are possible. Jonah, by this miraculous preservation, was designed to be made, 1. A monument of Divine mercy, for the encouragement of those that have sinned, and gone away from God, to return and repent. 2. A successful preacher to Nineveh; and this miracle wrought for his deliverance, if the tidings of it reached Nineveh, would contribute to his success. 3. An illustrious type of Christ, who was buried and rose again according to the Scriptures, 1 Cor. xv. 4; according to this Scripture, for, "as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so was the Son of man three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," Mat. xii. 40. Jonah's burial was a figure of Christ's. God prepared Jonah's grave, so he did Christ's, when it was long before ordained that he should "make his grave with the rich," Isa. liii. 9. Was Jonah's grave a strange one, a new one? so was Christ's, one in whom never man before was laid. Was Jonah there the best part of three days and three nights? so was Christ; but both in order to their rising again for the bringing of the doctrine of repentance to the Gentile world. "Come, see the place where Lord lay."

SHARK AND WHALE.

CHAPTER II.

We left Jonah in the belly of the fish, and had reason to think we should hear no more of him; that if he were not destroyed by the waters of the sea, he would be consumed in the bowels of that leviathan, "out of whose mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire," and whose "breath kindles coals," Job xli. 19, 21. But God brings his people through fire and through water, Ps. lxvi. 12; and by his power behold Jonah the prophet is yet alive, and is heard of again. In this chapter God hears from him, for we find him praying; in the next Nineveh hears from him, for we find him preaching. In his prayer we have, I. The great distress and danger he was in, ver. 2, 3, 5, 6. II. The despair he was thereby almost reduced to, ver. 4. III. The encouragement he took to himself in this deplorable condition, ver. 4—7. IV. The assurance he had of God's favour to him, ver. 6, 7. V. The warning and instruction he gives to others, ver. 8. VI. The praise and glory of all given to God, ver. 9. And in the last verse we have Jonah's deliverance out of the belly of the fish, and his coming safe and sound upon dry land again.

THEN Jonah prayed unto the LORD his God out of the fish's belly, 2 And said,

I cried by reason of mine affliction unto the LORD, and he heard me; [voice.

God and his servant Jonah had parted in anger, and the quarrel began on Jonah's side; he fled his country that he might outrun his work, but we hope to see them brought together again; and the reconciliation begins on God's side. In the close of the foregoing chapter we found God returning to Jonah in a way of mercy, delivering him from going down to the pit, having found a ransom; in this chapter we find Jonah returning to God in a way of duty. He was called up in the former chapter to pray to his God, but we are not told that he did so; however, now at length he is brought to it. Now observe here,

First. When he prayed; ver. 1, "Then Jonah prayed." Then, when he was in trouble, under the sense of sin, and the tokens of God's displeasure against him for sin, then he prayed. Note, When we are in affliction we must pray; then we have occasion to pray, then we have errands at the throne of grace, and business there. Then, if ever, we have a disposition to pray, when the heart is humbled and softened, and made serious; then God expects it; "In their affliction they will seek me early," seek me earnestly. And though we bring our afflictions upon ourselves by our sins, yet, if we pray in humility and godly sincerity, we shall be welcome to the throne of grace, as Jonah was. Then, when he was in a hopeful way of deliverance, being preserved alive by miracle, a plain indication that he was reserved for farther mercy, then he prayed. An apprehension of God's goodwill to us, notwithstanding our offences, gives us boldness of access to him, and opens the lips in prayer which were closed with the sense of guilt and dread of wrath.

Secondly. Where he prayed. In the fish's belly. No place amiss for prayer; "I will that men pray everywhere." Wherever God casts us we may find a way open heavenwards, if it be not our own fault. Undique ad cœlos tantundem est viæ,—'The heavens are equally accessible from every part of the earth.' He that hath Christ dwelling in his heart by faith, wherever he goes carries his altar along with him that sanctifies the gift, and is himself a living temple. Jonah was here in confinement, the belly of the fish was his prison, was a close and dark dungeon to him, yet there he had freedom of access to God, and walked at liberty in communion with him. Men may shut us out from communion with one another, but not from communion with God. Jonah was now in the bottom of the sea, yet "out of the depths he cries to God," as Paul and Silas prayed in the prison, in the stocks.

Thirdly. To whom he prayed. "To the Lord his God." He had been fleeing from God, but now he sees the folly of it, and returns to him. By prayer he draws near to that God whom he had gone aside from, and engageth his heart to approach to him. In prayer he has an eye to him, not only as the Lord, but as his God, a God in covenant with him; for, thanks be to God, every transgression in covenant doth not throw us out of covenant. This encourageth even backsliding children to return; Jer. iii. 22, "Behold, we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God."

Fourthly. What his prayer was. He afterwards recollected the substance of it, and left it upon record. He reflects upon the workings of his heart towards God, when he was in distress and danger, and the conflict that was then in his breast between faith and sense, between hope and fear.

1. He reflects upon the earnestness of his prayer, and God's readiness to hear and answer, ver. 2. He said, "I cried by reason of mine affliction unto the Lord." Note, Many that prayed not at all, or did but whisper prayer, when they were in prosperity, are brought to pray, nay, they are brought to cry by reason of their affliction; and it is for this end that afflictions are sent, and they are in vain if this end be not answered. Those "heap up wrath who cry not when God binds them," Job xxxvi. 13. "Out of the belly of hell," and the grave, "cried I." The fish might well be called a grave; and as it was a prison to which Jonah was condemned for his disobedience, and in which he lay under the wrath of God, it might well be called the belly of hell. Thither this good man was cast, and yet thence he cried to God, and it was not in vain: God heard him, heard the voice of his affliction, the voice of his supplication. There is a hell in the other world, out of which there is no crying to God, with any hope of being heard; but, whatever hell we may be in the belly of in this world, we may from thence cry to God. When Christ lay as Jonah three days and three nights in the grave, though he prayed not, as Jonah did, yet his very lying there cried to God for poor sinners, and the cry was heard.

2. He reflects upon the very deplorable condition that he was in, when he was in the belly of hell, which when he lay there he was very sensible of, and made particular remarks upon. Note, If we would get good by our troubles, we must take notice of our troubles, and of the hand of God in them. Jonah observes here,

1st. How low he was thrown; ver. 3, "Thou hadst cast me into the deep." The mariners cast him there; but he looked above them, and saw the hand of God casting him there. Whatever deeps we are cast into, it is God that casts us into them, and he it is that after he hath killed has power to cast into hell. He was cast into the midst of the seas, 'the heart of the seas,' so the word is; and from hence Christ borrows that Hebrew phrase, when he applies it to his own lying so long in the heart of the earth. For he that is laid dead in the grave, though never so shallow, is cut off as effectually from the land of the living as if he were laid in the heart of the earth.

2nd. How terribly he was beset. "The floods compassed me about;" the channels and springs of the waters of the sea, these surrounded him on every side; it was always high water with him. God's dear saints and servants are sometimes compassed with the floods of affliction, with troubles that are very forcible and violent, that bear down all before them, and that run constantly upon them, as the waters of a river, in a continual succession, one trouble upon the neck of another, as Job's messengers of evil tidings; and inclosed with them on all sides, as the church complains, Lam. iii. 7, "He hath hedged me about that I cannot get out," nor see which way I may flee for safety. "All thy billows and thy waves passed over me." Observe, he calls them God's billows and his waves, not only because he made them, "The sea is his, and he made it," and because he rules them, for "even the wind and the seas obey him," but because he had now commissioned them against Jonah, and limited them; had ordered them to afflict and terrify him, but not to destroy him. These words are plainly quoted by Jonah from Ps. xlii. 7, where, though the translations differ a little, in the original David's complaint is the same verbatim with this of Jonah's, "All thy billows and thy waves passed over me." What David spoke figuratively and metaphorically Jonah applies to himself as literally fulfilled. For the reconciling of ourselves to our afflictions, it is good to search precedents, that we may find there has no temptation taken us but such as is common to men. If ever any man's case was singular, and not to be paralleled, sure Jonah's was; and yet, to his great satisfaction, he finds even the man after God's own heart making the same complaint of God's waves and billows going over him that he has now occasion to make. When God performeth the thing that is appointed for us we shall find that many such things are with him, that even our path of trouble is no untrodden path, and God deals with us no otherwise than as he useth to deal with those that love his name. And therefore, for our assistance in our addresses to God when we are in trouble, it is good to make use of the complaints and prayers which the saints that have been before us made use of in the like case. See how good it is to be ready in the Scriptures. Jonah, when he could make no use of his Bible, by the help of his memory furnished himself from the Scripture with a very proper representation of his case; "All thy billows and thy waves passed over me." To the same purpose, ver. 5, "The waters compassed me even to the soul;" that is, they threatened his life, which was hereby brought into imminent danger; or, they made an impression upon his spirit. He saw them to be the tokens of God's displeasure, and in them the terrors of the Almighty set themselves in array against him; this reached to his soul, and put that in confusion. And this also is borrowed from David's complaint; Ps. lxix. 1, "The waters are come in unto my soul." When without are fightings, it is no marvel that within are fears. Jonah in the fish's belly finds the depths closing him round about, so that, if he would get out of his prison, yet he must unavoidably perish in the waters. He feels the seaweed (which the fish sucked in with the water) wrapped about his head, so that he had no way left him to help himself, nor hope that any one else could help him. Thus are the people of God sometimes perplexed and entangled, that they may learn not to trust in themselves, but in God that raiseth the dead, 2 Cor. i. 8, 9.

3rd. How fast he was held, ver. 6. He "went down to the bottom of the mountains," to the rocks in the sea, upon which the hills and promontories by the sea-side seem to be bottomed. He lay among them; nay, he lay under them. "The earth with her bars was about him," so close about him that it was likely to be about him for ever. The earth was so shut and locked, so barred and bolted against him, that he was quite cut off from any hope of ever returning to it. Thus helpless, thus hopeless, did Jonah's case seem to be. Those whom God contends with the whole creation is at war with.

3. He reflects upon the very black and melancholy conclusion he was then ready to make concerning himself, and the relief he obtained against it, ver. 4, 7.

1st. He began to sink into despair, and to give up himself for gone, and undone to all intents and purposes. When the waters compassed him about even to the soul, no marvel that his soul fainted within him, fainted away, so that he had not any comfortable enjoyments or expectations; his spirits quite failed, and he looked upon himself as a dead man. "Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight," and the apprehension of that was the thing that made his spirit faint within him. He thought God had quite forsaken him, would never return in mercy to him, nor shew him any token for good again. He had no example before him of any that were brought alive out of a fish's belly; if he thought of Job upon the dunghill, Joseph in the pit, David in the cave, yet these did not come up to his case. Nor was there any visible way of escape open for him, but by a miracle; and what reason had he to expect that a miracle of mercy should be wrought for him who was now made a monument of justice? His own conscience told him that he had wickedly "fled from the presence of the Lord," and therefore he might justly cast him away from his presence; and, in token of that, take away his Holy Spirit from him, never to visit him more. What hopes could he have of deliverance out of a trouble which his own ways and doings had procured to himself? Observe, when Jonah would say the worst he could of his case, he saith this, "I am cast out of thy sight." Those, and those only, are miserable whom God has cast out of his sight, whom he will no longer own and favour. What is the misery of the damned in hell but this, that they are cast out of God's sight? For what is the happiness of heaven but the vision and fruition of God? Sometimes the condition of God's people may be such in this world as that they may think themselves quite excluded from God's presence, so as no more to see him, or to be regarded by him. Jacob and Israel said, "My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God," Isa. xl. 27. Zion said, The Lord has forsaken me, my God has forgotten me, Isa. xlix. 14. But it is only the surmise of unbelief, for God hath not cast away his people whom he hath chosen.

2nd. Yet he recovered himself from sinking into despair, with some comfortable prospects of deliverance. Faith corrected and controlled the surmises of fear and distrust. Here was a mighty struggle between sense and faith, but faith had the last word, and came off a conqueror. In trying times the issue will be good at last, provided our faith do not fail; it was therefore the continuance of that in its vigour that Christ secured to Peter, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not," Lu. xxii. 32. David had fainted if he had not believed, Ps. xxvii. 13. Jonah's faith said, "Yet I will look again towards thy holy temple." Thus, though he was perplexed, yet not in despair; in the depth of the sea he had this hope in him, as an anchor of the soul, sure and stedfast. That which he supports himself with the hope of is, that he shall yet "look again towards God's holy temple." First. That he shall live. He shall look again heavenwards, shall again see the light of the sun, though now he seems to be cast into utter darkness; thus "against hope he believed in hope." Secondly. That he shall live and praise God; and a good man doth not desire to live for any other purpose, Ps. cxix. 175. That he shall enjoy communion with God again in holy ordinances, shall look towards, and go up to, the holy temple, there to inquire, there to behold the beauty of the Lord. When Hezekiah desired that he might be assured of his recovery, he asked, "What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord?" Isa. xxxviii. 22, as if that were the only thing for the sake of which he wished for health. So Jonah here hopes he shall look again towards the temple; that way he had looked many a time with pleasure, rejoicing when he was called to go up to the house of the Lord; and the remembrance of it was his comfort, that when he had an opportunity he was no stranger to the holy temple. But now he could not so much as look towards it; in the fish's belly he could not tell which way it lay, but he hopes he shall again be able to look towards it, to look on it, to look into it. Observe how modestly Jonah expresseth himself, as one conscious to himself of guilt and unworthiness. He dares not speak of dwelling in God's house, as David, knowing that he is no more worthy to be called a son, but he hopes he may be admitted to look towards it. He calls it the holy temple, for the holiness of it was in his eye the beauty of it, and that for the sake of which he loved and looked towards it. The temple was a type of heaven, and he promiseth himself that, though being now a captive exile, he should never be loosed, but die in the pit, yet he should look towards the heavenly temple, and be brought safe thither. Though he die in the fish's belly, in the bottom of the sea, yet from thence he hopes his soul shall be carried into Abraham's bosom. Or these words may be taken as Jonah's vow when he was in distress; and he speaks, ver. 9, of paying what he vowed. His vow is, that, if God deliver him, he will praise him in the gate of the daughter of Zion, Ps. ix. 13, 14. His sin for which God pursued him was, fleeing from the presence of the Lord, the folly of which he is now convinced of, and promiseth not only that he will never again look towards Tarshish, but that he will again look towards the temple, and will go from strength to strength, till he appear before God there. And thus we see how faith and hope were his relief in his desponding condition. To this he added prayer to God; ver. 7, "When my soul fainted within me, then I remembered the Lord," I betook myself to that cordial. He remembered what he is, how nigh to those that seem to be thrown at the greatest distance by trouble, how merciful to those that seem to have thrown themselves at a distance from him by sin. He remembered what he had done for him, what he had done for others, what he could do, what he had promised to do, and this kept him from fainting. And remembering God, he made his addresses to him, "My prayer came in unto thee;" that is, I sent it in, and expected to receive an answer to it. Note, Our afflictions should put us in mind of God, and thereby put us upon prayer to him. When our souls faint we must remember God, and when we remember God we must send up a prayer to him, a pious ejaculation at least; when we think on his name we should call on his name.

4. He reflects upon the favour of God to him, when thus in his distress he sought to God, and trusted in him.

1st. He graciously accepted his prayer, and gave admission and audience to it, ver. 7. My prayer being sent to him, came in unto him, even into his holy temple; it was heard in the highest heavens, though it was prayed in the lowest deeps.

2nd. He wonderfully wrought deliverance for him, and, when he was in the depth of his misery, gave him the earnest and assurance of it; ver. 6, "Yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption, O Lord my God." Some think he said this when he was vomited up on dry ground, and then it is the language of his thankfulness; and he sets it over against the great difficulty of his case, that the power of God might be the more magnified in his deliverance. "The earth with her bars was about me for ever," and yet "thou hast brought up my life from the pit," from the bars of the pit. Or, rather, we may suppose it spoken while he was yet in the fish's belly, and then it is the language of his faith; Thou hast kept me alive here, in the pit, and therefore thou canst, thou wilt, bring up my life from the pit. And he speaks of it with as much assurance as if it were done already; "Thou hast brought up my life." Though he has not an express promise of deliverance, he has an earnest of it, and on that he depends. He has life, and therefore believes his life shall be "brought up from corruption," and this assurance he addresseth to God, "Thou hast done it, O Lord my God." Thou art the Lord, and therefore canst do it; my God, and therefore wilt do it for me. Note, If the Lord be our God, he will be to us the resurrection and the life, will redeem our lives from destruction, from the power of the grave.

5. He gives warning to others, and instructs them to keep close to God only; ver. 8, "They that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy." That is,

1st. They that worship other gods, as the heathen mariners did, and call upon them, and expect relief and comfort from them, they forsake their own mercy, they stand in their own light, they turn their back upon their own happiness, and go quite out of the way of all good. Note, Idols are lying vanities, and those that pay that homage to them which is due to God only act as contrary to their interest as to their duty. Or,

2nd. They that follow their own inventions, as Jonah himself had done when he "fled from the presence of the Lord" to go to Tarshish, they forsake their own mercy, that mercy which they might find in God, and might have such a covenant right and title to it as to be able to call it their own, if they would but keep close to God and their duty. They that think to go any where to be from under the eye of God, as Jonah did—that think to mend themselves by outrunning his service, as Jonah did—and that grudge his mercy to any poor sinners, and pretend to be wiser than he in judging who are fit to have prophets sent them, and who not, as Jonah did—they observe lying vanities, are led away by foolish, groundless fancies, and, like him, they forsake their own mercy, and no good can come of it. Note, They that forsake their own duty forsake their own mercy, they that run away from the work of their place and day run away from the comfort of it.

6. He solemnly binds his soul with a bond, that if God work deliverance for him, the God of his mercies shall be the God of his praises, ver. 9. He covenants with God,

1st. That he will honour him in his devotions with the sacrifice of thanksgiving; and God hath said, for the encouragement of those that do so, that they that offer praise glorify him. He will, according to the law of Moses, bring a sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will offer that according to the law of nature, with "the voice of thanksgiving." The love and thankfulness of the heart to God are the life and soul of this duty; without it neither the sacrifice of thanksgiving nor the voice of thanksgiving will avail any thing. But it was then by a Divine appointment to be expressed by a sacrifice, in which the offerer presented the beast slain to God, not in lieu of himself, but in token of himself; and it is now to be expressed by "the voice of thanksgiving," the "calves of our lips," Hos. xiv. 2; the fruit of our lips, Heb. xiii. 15; speaking forth, singing forth, the high praises of our God. This Jonah here promiseth, that with the sacrifice of thanksgiving he will mention the loving-kindness of the Lord, to his glory, and the encouragement of others.

2nd. That he will honour him in his conversation by a punctual performance of his vows which he made in the fish's belly. Some think it was some work of charity that he vowed, or such a vow as Jacob's was, "Of all that thou hast given me, I will give the tenth unto thee." More probably his vow was, that if God would deliver him, he would readily go wherever he should please to send him, though it were to Nineveh. When we smart for deserting our duty, it is time to promise that we will adhere to it, and abound in it. Or, perhaps the sacrifice of thanksgiving is the thing he vowed, and that is it which he will pay, as David, Ps. cxvi. 17—19.

7. He concludes with an acknowledgment of God as the saviour of his people. "Salvation is of the Lord, it belongs to the Lord," Ps. iii. 8; he is the God of salvation, Ps. lxviii. 19, 20; he only can work salvation, and he can do it, be the danger and distress never so great; he has promised salvation to his people that trust in him. All the salvations of his church in general, and of particular saints, were wrought by him. He is the Saviour of them that believe, 1 Tim. iv. 10. Salvation is still of him, as it has always been; from him alone it is to be expected, and on him we are to depend for it. Jonah's experience shall encourage others in all ages to trust in God as the God of their salvation. All that read this story shall say it with assurance, say it with admiration, that salvation is of the Lord, and is sure to all that belongs to him.

10 And the LORD spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land.

CARAVANSARY ON THE SPOT WHERE JONAH IS SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN CAST ASHORE.

We have here Jonah's discharge from his imprisonment, and his deliverance from that death which there he was threatened with. His return, though not to life, for he lived in the fish's belly, yet to the land of the living, for from that he seemed to be quite cut off; his resurrection, though not from death, yet from the grave, for surely never man was so buried alive as Jonah in the fish's belly. His enlargement may be considered,

First. As an instance of God's power over all the creatures. God spake to the fish, gave him orders to return him, as before he had given him orders to receive him. God speaks to other creatures, and it is done; they are all his ready, obedient servants; but to man he speaketh once, yea, twice, and he perceiveth it not, regards it not, but turns a deaf ear to what he saith. Note, God has all creatures at his command, makes what use he pleaseth of them, and serves his own purposes by them.

Secondly. As an instance of God's mercy to a poor penitent, that in his distress prays to him. Jonah had sinned, had done foolishly, very foolishly, his own backsliding did now correct him, and it appears by his after carriage that his foolishness was not quite driven from him, no, not by the rod of his correction; and yet, upon his praying and humbling himself before God, here is a miracle in nature wrought for his deliverance, to intimate what a miracle of grace, free grace, God's reception and entertainment of returning sinners is. When God had him at his mercy, he shewed him mercy, and did not contend for ever.

Thirdly. As a type and figure of Christ's resurrection. He died and was buried to lay the storm which our sin had raised, and lay in the grave, as Jonah did, three days and three nights a prisoner for our debt; but the third day he came forth, as Jonah did, by his messengers, to preach repentance and remission of sins, even to the Gentiles. And thus was another Scripture fulfilled, "After two days he will receive us, and the third day he will raise us up," Hos. vi. 2. The earth trembled as if full of her burthen, as the fish was of Jonah.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter we have, I. Jonah's mission renewed, and the command a second time given him to go to Nineveh, ver. 1, 2. II. Jonah's message to Nineveh faithfully delivered, by which its speedy overthrow was threatened, ver. 3, 4. III. The repentance, humiliation, and reformation of the Ninevites hereupon, ver. 5—9. IV. God's gracious revocation of the sentence passed upon them, and the preventing of the ruin threatened, ver. 10.

AND the word of the LORD came unto Jonah the second time, saying, 2 Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee. 3 So Jonah arose, and went unto Nineveh, according to the word of the LORD. Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city of three days' journey. 4 And Jonah began to enter into the city a day's journey, and he cried, and said, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.

We have here a farther evidence of the reconciliation between God and Jonah, and that it was a thorough reconciliation, though the controversy between them had run high.

First. By this it appears that God was perfectly reconciled to Jonah, that he employed him again in his service; and the commission anew given him was an evidence of the remission of his former disobedience. Among men it has been justly pleaded that the giving of a commission to a criminal convicted is equivalent to a pardon; so it was to Jonah, ver. 1, "The word of the Lord came unto Jonah the second time;" for,

1. Jonah must be tried whether he do indeed repent of his former disobedience or no, and whether he have gotten the good designed him, both by his strange punishment and by his strange deliverance. He had deserted his work and duty, and had been under an arrest for it, had received a sentence of death within himself, but upon his submission God had released him, had given him his life, had given him his liberty; but it is upon his good behaviour that he is released, and he must again be put upon the trial, whether he will follow the will of God, or his own will. After he has been thrown into the sea, and thrown out again, God comes and asks him, Jonah, wilt thou go to Nineveh now? For when God judgeth he will overcome, he will gain his point, he will bring the disobedient stubborn child to his foot at last. Note, When God has afflicted us, and delivered us out of affliction, we must hear his voice saying to us, Now return to the duties which before you neglected, and which by these providences you are called to. God now said in effect to Jonah, as Christ said to the impotent man, when he had healed him, Now go and sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee, Jno. v. 14, a worse thing than lying three days and three nights in the whale's belly. God looks upon men when he has afflicted them, and has delivered them out of their affliction, to see whether they will mend of that fault particularly for which they were corrected; and therefore in that thing we are concerned to see to it that we receive not the grace of God in vain, neither in the correction nor in the deliverance, for both are designed to be means of grace.

2. Jonah shall be trusted, in token of God's favour to him. God might justly have said concerning Jonah, as we would concerning one that had cheated us, and dealt treacherously with us, that though we would not proceed to the rigour of the law against him, nor ruin him, yet we would never again repose a confidence in him. Justly might the spirit of prophecy, which Jonah had resisted and rebelled against, depart from him, with a resolution never to return to him any more. One would have expected that, though his life was spared, yet he should be laid under a disability and incapacity ever to serve the government again in the character of a prophet. But, behold, the word of the Lord comes to him again, to shew that when God forgives he forgets, and whom he forgives he gives a new heart and a new spirit to; he receives those into his family again, and restores them to their former estate, that had been prodigal children and disobedient servants. Note, God's making use of us is the best evidence of his being at peace with us. Hereby it will appear that our sins are pardoned, and we have the goodwill of God towards us. Doth his good word come unto us, and do we experience his good work in us? If so, we have reason to admire the riches of free grace, and to own our obligations to the Lord Jesus, who received gifts for men, "Yea, even for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell" even among them, and employ them in his work, Ps. lxviii. 18.

Secondly. By this it appears that Jonah was well reconciled to God; that he was not now, as he had been before, disobedient to the heavenly vision, did not flee from the presence of the Lord as he had done. He neither endeavoured to avoid hearing the command, nor did he decline obeying it; made no objections, as he had done, that the journey was long, the errand invidious, the delivery of it perilous, and if the threatened judgment did not come he should be reproached as a false prophet, and the impenitency of his own nation would be upbraided, (which he had objected, ch. iv. 2.) But now, without murmuring and disputing, "Jonah arose and went unto Nineveh, according to the word of the Lord," ver. 3. See here, 1. The nature of repentance. It is the change of our mind and way, and a return to our work and duty, from which we had turned aside; it is doing that good which we had left undone. 2. The benefit of affliction. It reduceth those to their place that had deserted it. Jonah might truly say with David, "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word;" and therefore, though it was dreadful, though it was painful to me, and for the present not joyous but grievous, yet "it was good," very good, "for me that I was afflicted." 3. See the power of Divine grace working with affliction, for otherwise affliction of itself would rather drive men from God than bring them to him; but God, by his grace, can turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, and make those willing in the day of his power, freely willing to come under his yoke, whose neck had been as an iron sinew. 4. See the duty of all those to whom the word of the Lord comes. They must in all points conform themselves to it, and yield a cheerful, faithful obedience to the orders God gives them. Jonah arose, and did not sit in sloth or sullenness; he went directly to Nineveh, though it was a great way off, and a place where it is likely he never was before; yet thither he took his journey, "according to the word of the Lord." God's servants must go where he sends them, come when he calls them, and do what he bids them. Whatever appears to be the word of the Lord, we must conscientiously do according to it. Let us now see what was the command and commission given him, and what he did in prosecution of it.

Thirdly. He was sent as a herald-at-arms, in the name of the God of heaven, to proclaim war with Nineveh; ver. 2, "Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city," that metropolis, and "preach unto it," preach against it, so the Chaldee. What is against us is preached to us that we may hear it and take warning; and what is preached to us, if we do not give ear to it, and mix faith with it, will prove to be against us. Jonah is sent to Nineveh, which was at this time the chief city of the Gentile world, as an indication of God's gracious intentions, in process of time, to make the light of Divine revelation to shine in those dark regions. God knew that if Sodom and Gomorrah, Tyre and Sidon, had had the means of grace, they would have repented, and yet he denied them those means, Mat. xi. 21, 23. He knew that if Nineveh had now the means of grace they would repent, and he gave them those means; sent Jonah, though not to preach repentance to them expressly, (for we find not that he had that in his commission,) yet to "preach them to repentance," for that was the happy effect of what he had in commission. If God thus, in dispensing his favours, in giving the means of grace to some places and not to others, and the spirit of grace to some persons and not to others, acts by prerogative and in a way of sovereignty, who may say unto him, What doest thou? "May he not do what he will with his own?" He is debtor to no man. Go and preach, saith God, "the preaching that I bid thee." That is,

1. The preaching that I did bid thee, when I first ordered thee to go thither, ch. i. 2. Go and cry against it, denounce Divine judgments against it, tell the men of Nineveh that their wickedness is come up to God, and God's vengeance is coming down upon them. This was the message Jonah was then very loath to deliver, and therefore flew off and went to Tarshish; but when he is brought to it the second time, God doth not at all alter the message to gratify him, or make it the more passable with him. No, he must now preach the very same that he was then ordered to preach, and would not. Note, The word of God is an unalterable thing, and will not be made to bend to the humours either of its preachers or of its hearers; it shall never comply with their humours and fancies, but they must comply with its truths and laws: see Jer. xv. 19, "Let them return unto thee, but return not thou unto them." Or,

2. The preaching that I shall bid thee when thou comest thither. This was an encouragement to him in his undertaking, that God would go along with him, that the spirit of prophecy should abide upon him and be ready to him when he was at Nineveh, to give him all the farther instructions that were needful for him. This intimated that he should hear from him again, which would be his great support in this hazardous expedition; as, when God sent Abraham to offer up Isaac, he gave him a like intimation, by telling him he must do it upon one of the mountains which he would afterwards direct him to. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord. He leads his people step by step, and so he expects they should follow him. Jonah must go with an implicit faith; though he knows whither he goes, he shall not know till he comes thither what message he must deliver, but whatever it is he must deliver it, be it pleasing or displeasing. Thus God will keep us in a continual dependence upon himself, and the directions of his word and providence. What he doth, and what he will have us to do, we know not now, but we shall know hereafter. Admirals sometimes, when they are sent abroad, are not to open their commission till they are got so many leagues off at sea; so Jonah must go to Nineveh, and when he comes there shall be told what to say.

Fourthly. He faithfully and boldly delivered his errand. When he came to Nineveh he found his diocese large; it was an "exceeding great city of three days' journey," ver. 2; a city great to God, so the Hebrew phrase is, meaning no more than, as we render it, exceeding great. This honour that language doth to the great God, that great things derive their denomination from him. The greatness of Nineveh consisted chiefly in the extent of it; it was much larger than Babylon; such a city, saith Diodorus Siculus, as no man ever after built. It was one hundred and fifty furlongs long, and ninety broad, and four hundred and eighty in compass. The walls one hundred feet high, and so thick that three chariots might go abreast upon them. On them were one thousand five hundred towers, each of them two hundred feet high. It is here said to be of three days' journey; for the compass of the walls, as some relate, was four hundred and eighty furlongs, which, allowing eight furlongs to a mile, makes sixty miles, which may well be reckoned three days' journey for a footman, twenty miles a day. Or, walking slowly and gravely, as Jonah must, when he went about preaching, it would take him up at least three days to go through all the principal streets and lanes of the city to proclaim his message, that all might have notice of it. And when he came hither he lost no time, he did not come to look about him, but applied himself closely to his work; and when he began to enter into the city he did not retire into an inn to refresh himself after his journey, but opened his commission immediately, according to his instructions, "and he cried, and said, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown." This, no doubt, he had particular warrant and direction to say; whether he enlarged upon this text, as is most probable, shewing them the controversy God had with them, and how provoking their wickedness was, and what reason they had to expect destruction, and to give credit to this warning; or whether he only repeated these words again and again, is not certain, but this was the purport of his message.

1. He must tell them that this great city shall be overthrown. He meant, and they understood him, that it should be overthrown, not by war, but by some immediate stroke from heaven; either by an earthquake, or by fire and brimstone, as Sodom was. The wickedness of cities ripens them for destruction, and their wealth and greatness cannot protect them from destruction when the measure of their iniquity is full, and the day of vengeance is come. Great cities are easily overthrown when the great God comes to reckon with them.

2. He must tell them that it shall shortly be overthrown, at the end of forty days. It has a reprieve granted; so long God will wait to see if, upon this alarm given, they will humble themselves, and amend their doings, and so prevent the ruin threatened. See how slow God is to wrath. Though Nineveh's wickedness cried for vengeance, yet it shall be spared for forty days, that it may have space to repent, and meet God in the way of his judgments. But he will wait no longer. If in that time they turn not, they shall know that he hath whet his sword and made it ready. Forty days is a long time for a righteous God to defer his judgments, yet it is but a little time for an unrighteous people to repent and reform in, and so turn away the judgments coming. The fixing of the day thus with all possible assurance would help to convince them that it was a message from God, for no man durst be so positive in prefixing a time, however he might prognosticate the thing itself; it would also startle them into a preparation for it. It may justly awaken secure sinners by a sincere conversion to prevent their own ruin, when they see they have but a little time to turn them in. And should it not awaken us to get ready for death, to consider that the thing itself is certain, and the time fixed in the counsel of God, but we are therefore kept in the dark and at uncertainty about it that we may be always ready. We cannot be so sure that we shall live forty days as Nineveh now was that it should stand forty days; nay, I think it is more probable we should die within thirty or forty days than that we should live thirty or forty years; and so many years in the day of our security we are apt to promise ourselves.

Fleres, si scires unum tua tempora mensem;
Rides, cum non sit forsitan una dies.

'We should be alarmed if we were sure not to live a month, and yet we are careless, though we are not sure to live a day.'

5 So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them. 6 For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes.

7 And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste any thing: let them not feed, nor drink water: 8 But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands. 9 Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not? 10 And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did it not.

Here is, First. A wonder of Divine grace in the repentance and reformation of Nineveh, upon the warning given them of their destruction approaching; "Verily, I say unto you," we have not found so great an instance of it, no, not in Israel; and it will "rise up in judgment against the men of" the gospel "generation," and condemn them; for the "Ninevites repented at the preaching of Jonas, but behold, a greater than Jonas is here," Mat. xii. 41. Nay, it did condemn the impenitency and obstinacy of Israel at that time. God sent many prophets to Israel, and those well known among them to be mighty in word and deed; but to Nineveh he sent only one, and he a stranger, whose aspect was mean, we may suppose, and his bodily presence weak, especially after the fatigue of so long a journey; and yet they repented, but Israel not. Jonah preached but one sermon, and we do not find that he gave them any sign or wonder, by the accomplishment of which his word might be confirmed, and yet they were wrought upon; while Israel continued obstinate, whose prophets chose out words wherewith to reason with them, and confirmed them by signs following. Jonah only threatened wrath and ruin; we do not find that he gave them any calls to repentance or directions how to repent, much less any encouragements to hope that they should find mercy if they did repent, and yet they repented; but Israel persisted in impenitency, though the prophets sent to them drew them with cords of a man and with bands of love, and assured them of great things which God would do for them if they did repent and reform. Now let us see what was the method of Nineveh's repentance, what the steps and particular instances of it.

1. They believed God; that is, they gave credit to the word which Jonah spake to them in the name of God. They believed that though they had many that they called gods, yet there is but one living and true God, the sovereign Lord of all; that to him they were accountable, that they had sinned against him, and were become obnoxious to his justice; that this notice sent them of ruin approaching came from him, and consequently that the ruin itself would come from him at the time prefixed, if it were not prevented by a timely repentance; that he is a merciful God, and there might be some hopes of the turning away of the wrath threatened, if they did turn away from the sins for which it was threatened. Note, They that come to God, that come back to him after they have revolted from him, must believe, must believe that he is, that he is reconcilable, that he will be theirs if they take the right course. And observe what great faith God can work by very small, weak, and unlikely means; he can bring even Ninevites, by a few threatening words, to be obedient to the faith. Some think the Ninevites heard from the mariners, or others, or from Jonah himself, of his being cast into the sea, and delivered thence by miracle, and that served for a confirmation of his mission, and brought them the more readily to believe God speaking by him; but of this we have no certainty. However, Christ's resurrection typified by that of Jonah's served for the confirmation of his Gospel, and contributed abundantly to their great success who in his name "preached repentance and remission of sins to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem."

2. They brought word to the king of Nineveh, who some think was at this time Sardanapalus, others Phul, king of Assyria. Jonah was not directed to go to him first, in respect to his royal dignity. Crowned heads, when guilty heads, are before God upon a level with common heads; and therefore Jonah is not sent to the court but to the streets of Nineveh, to make his proclamation. However, an account is brought of his errand to the king of Nineveh, not by way of information against Jonah as a disturber of the public peace, that he might be silenced and punished, which perhaps would have been done if he had cried thus in the streets of Jerusalem, who "killed God's prophets, and stoned them that were sent unto her." No, the account was brought him of it, not as of a crime, but as of a message from heaven, by some that were concerned for the public welfare, and whose hearts trembled for it. Note, Those kings are happy who have such about them as will give them notice of the things that belong to the kingdom's peace, of the warnings both of the word and providence of God, and the tokens of God's displeasure they are under; and those people are happy who have such kings over them as will take notice of those things.

3. The king set them a good example of humiliation; ver. 6, when he heard of the word of God sent to him, he "rose from his throne," as Eglon, king of Moab, who, when Ehud told him he had a message to him from God, rose up out of his seat. The king of Nineveh rose from his throne, not only in reverence to a word from God in general, but in fear of a word of wrath in particular, and in sorrow and shame for sin, by which he and his people were become obnoxious to his wrath. He rose from his royal throne, and laid aside his royal robe, the badge of his imperial dignity, as an acknowledgment that, not having used his power as he ought to have done, for the restraining of violence and wrong and the maintaining of right, he had forfeited his throne and robe to the justice of God, had rendered himself unworthy of the honour put upon him and the trust reposed in him as a king, and it was just with God to take it from him. Even the king himself disdained not to put on the garb of a penitent, for he "covered himself with sackcloth, and sat in ashes," in token of his humiliation for sin, and his dread of Divine vengeance. It well becomes the greatest of men to abase themselves before the great God.

4. The people conformed to the example of the king; nay, it should seem they led the way, for they first began to "put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them," ver. 5. The least of them, that had least to lose in the overthrow of the city, yet did not think themselves unconcerned in the alarm; and the greatest of them, that had used to lie at ease and live in state, did not think it below them to put on the marks of humiliation. The wearing of sackcloth, especially to those who were used to fine linen, was a very uneasy thing, and they would not have done it if they had not had a deep sense of their sin, and their danger by reason of sin, which hereby they designed to express. Note, Those that would not be ruined must be humbled; those that would not destroy their souls must afflict their souls. When God's judgments threaten us, we are concerned to humble ourselves under his mighty hand; and though bodily exercise alone profits nothing, and a man's spreading sackcloth and ashes under him, if that be all, is but a jest, it is the heart that God looks at, Isa. lviii. 5; yet on solemn days of humiliation, when God in his providences calls to mourning and girding with sackcloth, we must, by the outward expressions of inward sorrow, glorify God with our bodies, at least by laying aside the ornaments.

5. A general fast was proclaimed and observed throughout that great city, ver. 7–9. It was ordered "by the decree of the king and his nobles;" the whole legislative power concurred in appointing it, and the whole body of the people concurred in observing it; and both these ways it became a national act, and it was necessary it should be so when it was to prevent a national ruin. We have here the contents of this proclamation, and it is very observable. See here,

1st. What it is that is required by it. First. That the fast, properly so called, be very strictly observed. On the day appointed for this solemnity, "let neither man nor beast taste anything;" let them not take the least refreshment, no, not so much as drink water. Let them not plead they cannot fast so long without prejudice to their health, or that they cannot bear it; let them try for once. What if they do feel it an uneasiness, and feel from it for some time after? it is better to submit to that than be wanting in any act or instance of that repentance which is necessary to save a sinking city. Let them make themselves uneasy in body by putting on sackcloth, as well as by fasting, to shew how uneasy they are in mind through sorrow for sin, and the fear of Divine wrath. Even the beasts must do penance as well as man, because they had been made subject to vanity, as instruments of man's sin, and that either by their complaints, or their silent pining for want of meat, they might stir up their owners, and those that attended them, to the expressions of sorrow and humiliation. Those cattle that were kept within doors must not be fed and watered as usual, because no meat must be stirring on that day; things of that kind must be forgotten, and not minded. As when the psalmist was intent upon the praises of God, he called upon the inferior creatures to join with him therein, so, when the Ninevites were full of sorrow for sin, and dread of God's judgments, they would have the inferior creatures concur with them in the expressions of it. The beasts that used to be covered with rich and fine trappings, which were the pride of their masters, and theirs too, must now be covered with sackcloth; for the great men will, as becomes them, lay aside their equipage. Secondly. With their fasting and mourning they must join prayer and supplication to God; for the fasting is designed to fit the body for the service of the soul in the duty of prayer, which is the main matter, and to which the other is but preparatory or subservient. Let them "cry mightily to God;" let even the brute creatures do it according to their capacity; let their cries and moans for want of food be graciously construed as cries to God, as the cries of the young ravens are, Job xxxviii. 41, and of the young lions, Ps. civ. 21. But especially let the men, women, and children cry to God; let them cry mightily for the pardon of the sins that cry against them, and the preventing of the judgments which were by Jonah cried against them. It was time to cry to God when there was but a step between them and ruin—high time to seek the Lord. And in prayer we must cry mightily with a fixedness of thought, firmness of faith, and fervour of pious and devout affections. By crying mightily we wrestle with God, we take hold of him, and we are concerned to do so when he is not only departing from us as a friend, but coming against us an enemy. It therefore concerns us in prayer to stir up all that is within us. Yet this is not all: Thirdly. They must to their fasting and prayer add reformation and amendment of life. "Let them turn every one from his evil way," the evil way he hath chosen, the evil way he is addicted to and walks in, the evil way of his heart, and the evil way of his conversation, and particularly from the violence that is in their hands; let them restore what they have unjustly taken, and make reparation for what wrong they have done; and let them not any more oppress those they have power over, or defraud those they have dealings with. Let the men in authority, at the court end of the town, turn "from the violence that is in their hand," and not decree unrighteous decrees, or give wrong judgment upon appeals made to them; let the men of business, at the trading end of the town, turn from the violence in their hands, and use no unjust weights or measures, nor impose upon the ignorance or necessity of those they trade with. Note, It is not enough to fast for sin, but we must fast from sin, and in order to the success of our prayers must no more "regard iniquity in our hearts," Ps. lxvi. 18. This is "the only fast that God hath chosen," and will accept, Isa. lviii. 6; Zec. vii. 5, 9. The work of a fast-day is not done with the day; no, then the hardest and most needful part of the work begins, which is to turn from sin, and to live a new life, and not return with the dog to his vomit.

2nd. Upon what inducement this fast is proclaimed and religiously observed; ver. 9, "Who can tell if God will turn and repent?" Observe, First. What is it that they hope for? That God will, upon their repenting and turning, change his way towards them, and revoke his sentence against them; that he will turn from his fierce anger, which they own they deserve, and yet humbly and earnestly deprecate; and that thus their ruin will be prevented, and they perish not. They cannot object against the equity of the judgment, they pretend not to set it aside by appealing to a higher court, but hope in God himself that he will repent, and that his own mercy, to which they fly, shall rejoice against judgment. They believe that God is justly angry with them, and that, their sin being very heinous, his anger is very fierce, and that if he proceed against them there is no remedy, but they die, they perish, they all perish, and are undone; for who knows the power of his anger? It is not therefore the threatened overthrow that they pray for the prevention of, but the anger of God that they pray for the turning of. As when we pray for the favour of God we pray for all good, so when we pray against the wrath of God we pray against all evil. Secondly. What degree of hope they had of it. "Who can tell if God will turn to us?" Jonah had not told them; they had not among them any other prophets to tell them, so that they could not be so confident of finding mercy upon their repentance as we may be that have the promise and oath of God to depend upon, and especially the merit and mediation of Christ to trust to for pardon upon repentance. Yet they had a general notion of the goodness of God's nature, his mercy to man, and his being pleased with the repentance and conversion of sinners; and from this they raised some hopes that he would spare them: they dare not presume, but they will not despair. Note, Hope of mercy is the great encouragement to repentance and reformation; and though there be but some glimmerings of hope, mixed with great fears, arising from a sense of our own sinfulness and unworthiness, and long abuse of Divine patience, yet they may serve to quicken and engage our serious repentance and reformation. Let us boldly cast ourselves at the footstool of free grace, resolving that, if we perish, we will perish there; yet who knows but God will look upon us with compassion?

Secondly. Here is a wonder of Divine mercy in the sparing of these Ninevites upon their repentance; ver. 10, "God saw their works." He not only heard their good words, by which they professed repentance, but saw their good works, by which they "brought forth fruits meet for repentance." He saw that they turned from their evil way, and that was the thing he looked for and required; if he had not seen that, their fasting and sackcloth would have been as nothing in his account. He saw there was among them a general conviction of their sins, and a general resolution not to return to them, and that for some days they lived better, and there was a new face of things upon the city; and this he was greatly well pleased with. Note, God takes notice of every instance of the reformation of sinners, even those instances that fall not under the cognizance and observation of the world. He sees who turn from their evil way and who do not, and meets those with favour that meet him in a sincere conversion; when they repent of the evil of sin committed by them, he repents of the evil of judgment pronounced against them. Thus he spared Nineveh, and did not the evil which he said he would do against it. Here were no sacrifices offered to God that we read of to make atonement for sin, but the "sacrifice of God is a broken spirit." "A broken and a contrite heart," such as the Ninevites now had, is what he will not despise; it is what he will give countenance to and put honour upon.

CHAPTER IV.

We read with a great deal of pleasure, in the close of the foregoing chapter, concerning the repentance of Nineveh, but in this chapter we read with a great deal of uneasiness concerning the sin of Jonah; and as there is joy in heaven and earth for the conversion of sinners, so there is grief for the follies and infirmities of saints. In all the book of God we scarce find a servant of the Lord, (and such a one we are sure Jonah was, for the Scripture calls him so,) so very much out of temper as he is here, so very peevish and provoking to God himself. In the first chapter we had him fleeing from the face of God, but here we have him, in effect, flying in the face of God, and which is more grievous to us, there we had an account of his repentance and return to God; but here, though no doubt he did repent, yet, as in Solomon's case, no account is left us of his recovering himself; but while we read with wonder of his perverseness, we read with no less wonder of God's tenderness towards him, by which it appeared he had not cast him off. Here is, I. Jonah's repining at God's mercy to Nineveh, and the fret he was in about it, ver. 1—3. II. The gentle reproof God gave him for it, ver. 4. III. Jonah's discontent at the withering of the gourd, and his justifying of himself in that discontent, ver. 5—9. IV. God's improving of it for his conviction, that he ought not to be angry at the sparing of Nineveh, ver. 10, 11. Man's badness and God's goodness serve here for a foil to each other, that the former may appear the more exceeding sinful and the latter the more exceeding gracious.

BUT it displeased Jonah exceedingly, and he was very angry. 2 And he prayed unto the LORD, and said, I pray thee, O LORD, was not this my saying, when I was yet in my country? Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish: for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil. 3 Therefore now, O LORD, take, I beseech thee, my life from me; for it is better for me to die than to live. 4 Then said the LORD, Doest thou well to be angry?

See here, First. How unjustly Jonah quarrelled with God for his mercy to Nineveh upon their repentance. This gives us occasion to suspect that Jonah had only delivered the message of wrath against the Ninevites, and had not at all assisted or encouraged them in their repentance, as one would have thought he should have done; for when they did repent, and found mercy,

1. Jonah grudged them the mercy they found; ver. 1, "It displeased Jonah exceedingly;" and, would you think it? "He was very angry," was in a great heat about it. It was very ill, 1st. That he had so little government of himself as to be displeased and very angry. He had no rule over his own spirit, and therefore, as a city broken down, lay exposed to temptations and snares. 2nd. That he had so little reverence of God as to be displeased and angry at what he did, as David was when the Lord had made a breach upon Uzza. Whatever pleaseth God should please us; and though we cannot account for it, yet we must acquiesce in it. 3rd. That he had so little affection to men as to be displeased and very angry at the conversion of the Ninevites, and their reception into the Divine favour. This was the sin of the scribes and Pharisees, who murmured at our Saviour because he entertained publicans and sinners. But "is our eye evil, because his is good?" But why was Jonah so uneasy at it, that the Ninevites repented and were spared? It cannot be expected we should give any good reason for a thing so very absurd and unreasonable; no, nor any thing that has the face or colour of reason. But we may conjecture what the provocation was. Hot spirits are usually high spirits; only by pride comes contention, both with God and man. It was a point of honour that Jonah stood upon, and that made him angry. First. He was jealous for the honour of his country. The repentance and reformation of Nineveh shamed the obstinacy of Israel, that repented not, but hated to be reformed. And the favour of God shewed to these Gentiles upon their repentance was an ill omen to the Jewish nation, as if they should be, as at length they were, rejected and cast out of the church, and the Gentiles substituted in their room. When it was intimated to St. Peter himself that he should make no difference between Jews and Gentiles, he startled at the thing, and said, "Not so, Lord;" no marvel then that Jonah looked upon it with regret that Nineveh should become a favourite. Jonah herein had a zeal for God, as the God of Israel in a particular manner, but not according to knowledge. Note, Many are displeased with God under pretence of concern for his glory. Secondly. He was jealous for his own honour, fearing lest, if Nineveh was not destroyed within forty days, he should be accounted a false prophet, and stigmatized accordingly; whereas he needed not be under any discontent about that, for in the threatening of ruin it was implied that for the preventing of it they should repent, and if they did it should be prevented. And no one will complain of being deceived by him that is better than his word; and he would rather gain honour among them, by being instrumental to save them, than fall under any disgrace. But melancholy men (and such an one Jonah seems to have been) are apt to make themselves uneasy by fancying evils to themselves that are not, nor are ever likely to be. Most of our frets, as well as our frights, are owing to the power of imagination, and those are to be pitied as perfect bondslaves that are under the power of such a tyrant.

2. He quarrelled with God about it. When his heart was hot within him, he "spake unadvisedly with his lips;" and here he tells us what he said; ver. 2, 3, "He prayed unto the Lord," but it is a very awkward prayer, not like that which he prayed in the fish's belly; for affliction teacheth us to pray submissively, which Jonah now forgot to do. Being in discontent, he applied himself to the duty of prayer, as he used to do in his troubles, but his corruptions got head of his graces, and when he should have been praying for benefit by the mercy of God himself, he was complaining of the benefit others had by that mercy. Nothing could be spoken more unbecomingly.

1st. He now begins to justify himself in fleeing from the presence of the Lord when he was first ordered to go to Nineveh, for which he had before, with good reason, condemned himself. "Lord," saith he, "was not this my saying when I was in my own country?" Did I not foresee, that if I went to preach to Nineveh, they would repent, and thou wouldst forgive them, and then thy word would be reflected upon and reproached, as Yea and Nay? What a strange sort of man was Jonah to dread the success of his ministry! Many have been tempted to withdraw from their work because they have despaired of doing good by it, but Jonah declined preaching because he was afraid of doing good by it; and still he persists in the same corrupt notion, for it seems the whale's belly itself could not cure him of it. It was his saying when he was in his own country, but it was an ill saying; yet here he stands to it, and, very unlike the other prophets, desires the woful day which he had foretold, and grieves because it doth not come. Even Christ's disciples "know not what manner of spirit they are of;" they did not who wished for fire from heaven upon the city that did not receive them, much less did Jonah, who wished for fire from heaven upon the city that did receive him, Lu. ix. 55. Jonah thinks he has reason to complain of that, when it is done, which he was before afraid of; so hard is it to get a root of bitterness plucked out of the mind when once it is fastened there. And why did Jonah expect that God would spare Nineveh? Because I knew that thou wast a gracious God, indulgent, and easily pleased,—that thou wast "slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil." All this is very true, and Jonah could not but know it by God's proclamation of his name, and the experience of all ages, but it is strange and very unaccountable, that that which all the saints had made the matter of their joy and praise Jonah should make the matter of reflection upon God, as if that were an imperfection of the Divine nature which is indeed the greatest glory of it, that God is gracious and merciful. The servant that said, "I know thee to be a hard man," said that which was false, and yet, had it been true, it was the proper matter of a complaint; but Jonah, though he saith what is true, yet, speaking it by way of reproach, speaks very absurdly. Those have a spirit of contention and contradiction indeed that can find in their hearts to quarrel with the goodness of God, and his sparing, pardoning mercy, to which we all owe it that we are out of hell. This is making that to be to us a "savour of death unto death" which ought to be a "savour of life unto life."

2nd. In a passion he wishes for death, ver. 3, a strange expression of his causeless passion; "Now, O Lord, take, I beseech thee, my life from me." If Nineveh must live, let me die, rather than see thy word and mine disproved, rather than see the glory of Israel transferred to the Gentiles, as if there were not grace enough in God both for Jews and Gentiles, or as if his countrymen were the farther off from mercy for the Ninevites being taken into favour. When the prophet Elijah had laboured in vain, he wished he might die, and it was his infirmity, 1 Kin. xix. 4. But Jonah labours to good purpose, saves a great city from ruin, and yet wisheth he might die, as if, having done much good, he were afraid of living to do more; he sees of the travail of his soul, and is dissatisfied. What a perverse spirit is mingled with every word he saith! When Jonah was brought alive out of the whale's belly, he thought life a very valuable mercy, and was thankful to that God who brought up "his life from corruption," ch. ii. 6, and a great blessing his life had been to Nineveh; yet now for that very reason it is become a burthen to himself, and he begs to be eased of it, pleading, "It is better for me to die than live." Such a word as this may be the language of grace, as it was in Paul, who desired to depart and be with Christ, which is far better; but here it was the language of folly, and passion, and strong corruption, and so much the worse. First. That Jonah was now in the midst of his usefulness, and therefore fit to live. He was one whose ministry God wonderfully owned and prospered. The conversion of Nineveh might give him hopes of being instrumental to convert the whole kingdom of Assyria. It was therefore very absurd for him to wish he might die, when he had a prospect of living to so good purpose, and could be so ill spared. Secondly. That he was now so much out of temper, and therefore unfit to die. How durst he think of dying, and going to appear before God's judgment-seat, when he was actually quarrelling with him? Was this a frame of spirit proper for a man to go out of the world in? But those who passionately desire death commonly have least reason to do it, as being very much unprepared for it. Our business is to get ready to die by doing the work of life, and then refer ourselves to God to take away our life when and how he pleases.

Secondly. See how justly God reproved Jonah for this heat that he was in; ver. 4, the Lord said, "Doest thou well to be angry?" Is doing well a displeasure to thee? so some read it. What! Dost thou repent of thy good deeds? God might justly have rejected him for this impious heat he was in, might justly have taken him at his word, and have struck him dead when he wished to die; but he vouchsafes to reason with him for his conviction, and to reduce him to a better temper; as the father of the prodigal reasoned with his elder son, when, as Jonah here, he murmured at the remission and reception of his brother. "Doest thou well to be angry?" See how mildly the great God speaks to this foolish man, to teach us to restore those that are fallen with a spirit of meekness, and with soft answers to turn away wrath. God appeals to himself, and to his own conscience, "Doest thou well?" Thou knowest thou dost not. We should often put this question to ourselves, Is it well to say thus, to do thus? Can I justify it? Must I not unsay it, and undo it again by repentance, or be undone for ever? Ask, 1. Do I well to be angry? When passion is up let it meet with this check, Do I well to be so soon angry, so oft angry, so long angry, to put myself into such a heat, and to give others such ill language in my anger? Is this well, that I suffer these headstrong passions to get dominion over me? 2. Do I well to be angry at the mercy of God to repenting sinners? That was Jonah's crime. Do we well to be angry at that which is so much for the glory of God and the advancement of his kingdom among men? to be angry at that which angels rejoice in, and for which abundant thanksgivings will be rendered to God? We do ill to be angry at that grace which we ourselves need, and are undone without. If room were not left for repentance, and hope given of pardon upon repentance, what would become of us? Let the conversion of sinners, which is the joy of heaven, be our joy, and never our grief.

5 So Jonah went out of the city, and sat on the east side of the city, and there made him a booth, and sat under it in the shadow, till he might see what would become of the city. 6 And the LORD God prepared a gourd, and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief. So Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd. 7 But God prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered. 8 And it came to pass, when the sun did arise, that God prepared a vehement east wind; and the sun beat upon the head of Jonah, that he fainted, and wished in himself to die, and said, It is better for me to die than to live. 9 And God said to Jonah, Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd? And he said, I do well to be angry, even unto death. 10 Then said the LORD, Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night: 11 And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?

Jonah persists here in his discontent; for the beginning of strife, both with God and man, is as the letting forth of waters, the breach grows wider and wider, and when passion gets head ill is made worse; it should therefore be silenced and suppressed at first. We have here,

First. Jonah's sullen expectation of the fate of Nineveh. We may suppose the Ninevites, giving credit to the message he brought, were ready to give entertainment to the messenger that brought it, and to shew him respect, that they would have bid him welcome to the best of their houses and tables; but Jonah was out of humour, would not accept their kindness, not carry it towards them with common civility, which one might have feared would have prejudiced them against him and his word. But when there is not only the treasure put into earthen vessels, but the trust lodged with men subject to like passions as we are, and yet the point gained, it must be owned that the excellency of the power appears so much the more to be of God and not of man. Jonah retires, goes out of the city, sits alone, and keeps silence, because he sees the Ninevites repent and reform, ver. 5. Perhaps he told those about him that he went out of the city for fear of perishing in the ruins of it; but he went to "see what would become of the city," as Abraham went up to see what would become of Sodom, Gen. xix. 27. The forty days were now expiring or expired, and Jonah hopes that, if Nineveh be not overthrown, yet that some judgment or other shall come upon it sufficient to save his credit; however, it is with great uneasiness that he waits the issue. He will not sojourn in a house, expecting it would fall upon his head, but he makes him a booth of the boughs of trees, and sits in that, though there he would lie exposed to wind and weather. Note, It is common for those that have fretful, uneasy spirits, industriously to create inconveniences to themselves, that, resolving to complain, they may still have something to complain of.

Secondly. God's gracious provision for his shelter and refreshment, when he thus foolishly afflicted himself, and was still adding yet more and more to his own affliction, ver. 6. Jonah was sitting in his booth, fretting at the cold of the night and the heat of the day, which were both grievous to him; and God might have said, It is his own choice, his own doing, a house of his own building, let him make the best of it; but he looked on him with compassion, as the tender mother doth on the froward child, and relieved him against the grievances which he by his own wilfulness created to himself. He "prepared a gourd," a plant with broad leaves, and full of them, that suddenly grew up and covered his hut and booth, so as to keep off much of the injury of the cold and heat. It was a "shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief," that, being refreshed in body, he might the better guard against the uneasiness of his mind, which outward crosses and troubles are often the occasion and increase of. See how tender God is of his people in their affliction, yea, though they are foolish and froward; nor is he extreme to mark what they do amiss. God had before "prepared a great fish" to secure Jonah from the injuries of the water, and here a great gourd to secure him from the injuries of the air; for he is the protector of his people against evils of every kind, has the command of plants as well as animals, and can soon prepare them to make them serve his purposes, can make their growth sudden which in a course of nature is slow and gradual. A gourd, one would think, was but a slender fortification at the best, yet "Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd;" for,

1. It was really at that time a great comfort to him. A thing in itself small and inconsiderable, yet, coming seasonably, may be to us a very valuable blessing. A gourd in the right place may do us more service than a cedar. The least creatures may be great plagues, as flies and lice were to Pharaoh, or great comforts, as the gourd to Jonah, according as God is pleased to make them.

2. He, being now much under the power of imagination, took a greater complacency in it than there was cause for. He was exceeding glad of it, was proud of it, and triumphed in it. Note, Persons of strong passions, as they are apt to be cast down with a trifle that crosseth them, so they are apt to be lifted up with a trifle that pleaseth them. A small toy will serve sometimes to pacify a cross child, as the gourd did Jonah. But wisdom and grace would teach us both to weep for our troubles as though we wept not, and to rejoice in our troubles as though we rejoiced not. Creature comforts we ought to enjoy, and be thankful for, but we need not be exceeding glad of them; it is God only that must be our exceeding joy, Ps. xliii. 4.

Thirdly. The sudden loss of this provision God had made for his refreshment, and the return of his troubles, ver. 7, 8. God, that had provided comfort for him, provided also an affliction for him in that very thing which was his comfort; the affliction did not come by chance, but by Divine direction and appointment.

1. God "prepared a worm" to wither the gourd. He that gave took away, and Jonah ought to have blessed his name in both; but because, when he took the comfort of the gourd, he did not give God the praise of it, he deprived him of the benefit of it, and justly. See what all our creature comforts are, and what we may expect them to be; they are gourds, have their root in the earth, are but a thin and slender defence compared with the Rock of ages; they are withering things, they perish in the using, and we are soon deprived of the comfort of them. The gourd withered the next day after it sprang up. Our comforts come forth like flowers, and are soon cut down; when we please ourselves most with them, and promise ourselves most from them, we are disappointed; a little thing withers them; a small worm at the root destroys a large gourd; something unseen and undiscerned doth it; our gourds wither, and we know not what to attribute it to. And perhaps those wither first that we have been more exceeding glad of—that proves least safe that is most dear. God did not send an angel to pluck up Jonah's gourd, but sent a worm to wither it; there it grew still, but it stood him in no stead. Perhaps our creature comforts are continued to us, but they are embittered; the creature continued, but the comfort gone, and the remains, or ruins of it rather, do but upbraid us with our folly in being exceeding glad of it.

2. He "prepared a wind" to make Jonah feel the want of the gourd, ver. 8. It was "a vehement east wind," which drove the heat of the rising sun violently upon the head of Jonah. This wind was not as a fan to abate the heat, but as bellows to make it more intense. Thus poor Jonah lay open to sun and wind.

Fourthly. The farther fret that this put Jonah into; ver. 8, "He fainted, and wished in himself that he might die." If the gourd be killed, if the gourd be dead, kill me too; let me die with the gourd. Foolish man, that thinks his life bound up in the life of a weed! Note, It is just that those who love to complain should never be left without something to complain of, that their folly may be manifested and corrected, and, if possible, cured. And see here how the passions that run into an extreme one way commonly run into an extreme the other way; Jonah, that was in transports of joy when the gourd flourished, is in pangs of grief when the gourd is withered. Inordinate affection lays a foundation for inordinate affliction; and what we are over-fond of when we have it, we are apt to over-grieve for when we lose it, and we may see our folly in both.

Fifthly. The rebuke God gave him for this. He again reasoned with him; "Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd?" ver. 9. Note, The withering of a gourd is a thing which it doth not become us to be angry at. When afflicting providences deprive us of our relations, possessions, enjoyments, we must bear it patiently, must not be angry at God, must not be angry for the gourd. It is comparatively but a small loss, the loss of a shadow, that is the most we can make of it. It was a gourd, a withering thing; we could expect no other but that it should wither. Our being angry for the withering of it will not recover it; we ourselves shall shortly wither like it. If one gourd be withered another gourd may spring up in the room of it; but that which should especially silence our discontent is, that, though our gourd be gone, our God is not gone, and there is enough in him to make up all our losses. Let us therefore own that we do ill, that we do very ill, to be angry for the gourd; and let us under such events quiet ourselves as a child that is weaned from his mother.

Sixthly. His justification of his passion and discontent, and it is very strange; ver. 9, he said, "I do well to be angry, even unto death." It is bad to speak amiss, yet if it be in haste, if what is said amiss be presently recalled and unsaid again, it is the more excusable; but to speak amiss, and stand to it, is bad indeed. So Jonah did here, though God himself rebuked him, and by appealing to his conscience expected he should have rebuked himself. See what brutish things ungoverned passions are, and how much it is our interest, and ought to be our endeavour, to chain up these roaring lions and raging bears. Sin and death are two very dreadful things, yet Jonah in his heat makes light of them both. 1. He has so little regard for God as to fly in the face of his authority, and to say he did well in that which God said was ill done. Passion often overrules conscience, and forces it, when it is appealed to, to give a false judgment, as Jonah here did. 2. He has so little regard to himself as to abandon his own life, and to think it no harm to indulge his passion, even to death, to kill himself with fretting. We read of wrath that "kills the foolish man," and envy that "slays the silly one," Job v. 2; and foolish silly ones indeed they are that cut their own throats with their own passions, that fret themselves into consumptions and other weaknesses, and put themselves into fevers with their own intemperate heats.

Seventhly. The improvement of it against him for his conviction that he did ill to murmur at the sparing of Nineveh. Out of his own mouth God will judge him; and we have reason to think it overcame him, for he made no reply, but we hope returned to his right mind, and recovered his temper, though he could not keep it, and all was well. Now let us see how God argued with him; ver. 10, 11, "Thou hast had pity on the gourd," hast spared it, (so the word is,) didst what thou couldest, and wouldest have done more, to keep it alive, and saidst, What a pity it is that this gourd should ever wither! and "Should not I then spare Nineveh?" should not I have as much compassion upon that as thou hadst upon the gourd, and forbid the earthquake which would ruin that, as thou wouldest have forbidden the worm that withered the gourd? Consider,

1. The gourd thou hadst pity on was but one, but the inhabitants of Nineveh I have pity on are numerous. It is a great city, and very populous, as appears by the number of the infants, suppose from two years old and under; there are a hundred and twenty thousand such in Nineveh, that are not come to so much use of understanding as to know their right hand from their left, for they are yet but babes. These are taken notice of because the age of infants is commonly looked upon as the age of innocency. So many there were in Nineveh that had not been guilty of any actual transgression, and consequently had not themselves contributed to the common guilt, and yet, if Nineveh be overthrown, all will be involved in the common calamity, and shall not I spare Nineveh then with an eye to them? God has a tender regard to little children, and is ready to pity and succour them. Nay, here a whole city is spared for their sakes, which may encourage parents to present their children to God by faith and prayer, that, though they are not capable of doing him any service, for they cannot discern between their right hand and their left, between good and evil, sin and duty, yet they are capable of participating in his favours, and of obtaining salvation. The great Saviour discovered a particular kindness for the children that were brought to him, when he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them. Nay, God took notice of the abundance of cattle too that were in Nineveh, which he had more reason to pity and spare than Jonah had to pity and spare the gourd, in as much as the animal life is more excellent than the vegetable.

2. The gourd, which Jonah was concerned for, was none of his own,—it was that for which he did not labour, nor made it to grow; but the persons in Nineveh, whom God had compassion on, were all the work of his own hands, whose beings he was the author of, whose lives he was the preserver of, whom he planted, and made to grow. He made them, and his they were, and therefore he had much more reason to have compassion on them, for he cannot "despise the work of his own hands," Job x. 3; and thus Job there argues with him, ver. 8, 9, "Thy hands have made me and fashioned me," have "made me as the clay," and "wilt thou destroy me, wilt thou bring me into dust again?" And thus he here argues with himself.

3. The gourd which Jonah had pity on was of a sudden growth, and therefore of less value. It "came up in a night;" it was the son of a night, so the word is, but Nineveh is an ancient city, of many ages standing, and therefore cannot be so easily given up. The persons I spare have been many years in growing up, not so soon reared as the gourd; and shall not I then have pity on them, that have been so many years the care of my providence, so many years my tenants?

4. The gourd which Jonah had pity on "perished in a night," it withered and there was an end of it; but the precious souls in Nineveh that God had pity on are not so short-lived; they are immortal, and therefore to be carefully and tenderly considered. One soul is of more value than the whole world, and the gain of the world will not countervail the loss of it; surely then one soul is of more value than many gourds,—of more value than many sparrows. So God accounts, and so should we, and therefore have a greater concern for the children of men than for any of the inferior creatures, and for our own and others' precious souls than for any of the riches and enjoyments of this world.

From all this we may learn, 1st. That, though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, yet he will not suffer them to lie still in it, but will take a course effectually to shew them their error, and to bring them to themselves, and to their right mind again. We have reason to hope that Jonah after this was well reconciled to the sparing of Nineveh, and was as well pleased with it as ever he had been displeased. 2nd. That God will justify himself in the methods of his grace towards repenting, returning sinners, as well as in the course his justice takes with them that persist in their rebellion. Though there be those that murmur at the mercy of God because they do not understand it, for his thoughts and ways therein are as far above ours as heaven above the earth, yet he will make it evident that therein he acts like himself, and will be justified when he speaks. See what pains he takes with Jonah to convince him that it was very fit Nineveh should be spared. Jonah had said, "I do well to be angry," but he could not prove it. God saith it, and proves it, "I do well to be merciful." And it is a great encouragement to poor sinners to hope that they shall find mercy with him, that he is so ready to justify himself in shewing mercy, and to triumph in those whom he makes the monuments of it, against those whose eye is evil because his is good. Such murmurers shall be made to understand this doctrine, that, how narrow soever their souls, their principles are, and how willing soever they are to engross Divine grace to themselves, and those of their own way, there is one "Lord over all, that is rich in mercy to all that call upon him;" and in every nation, in Nineveh as well as in Israel, "he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him;" he that repents and turns from his evil way shall find mercy with him.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF JONAH.

The opinion which has been most generally entertained is that which accords to the book a strictly historical character; in other words, which affirms that it is a relation of facts which actually took place in the life and experience of the prophet. Nor can I view it in any other light, while I hold fast an enlightened belief in the Divine authority of the books composing the canon of the Old Testament, and place implicit reliance on the authority of the Son of God. But assuming that all the books contained in it possess the Divine sanction, the test to which I would bring the question, and by which, in my opinion, our decision must mainly be formed, is the unqualified manner in which the personal existence, miraculous fate, and public ministry of Jonah, are spoken of by our Lord. He not only explicitly recognises the prophetical office of the son of Amittai, (Ἰωνᾶ τοῦ προφήτου,) just as he does that of Elisha, Isaiah, and Daniel, but represents his being in the belly of the fish as a real miracle (τὸ σημεῖον); grounds upon it, as a fact, the certainty of the future analogous fact in his own history; assumes the actual execution of the commission of the prophet at Nineveh; positively asserts that the inhabitants of that city repented at his preaching; and concludes by declaring respecting himself, "Behold! a greater than Jonah is here," Mat. xii. 39—41; xvi. 4. Now, is it conceivable that all these historical circumstances would have been placed in this prominent light, if the person of the prophet, and the brief details of his narrative, had been purely fictitious? On the same principle that the historical bearing of the reference in this case is rejected, may not that to the queen of Sheba, which follows in the connection, be set aside, and the portion of the first book of Kings, in which the circumstances of her visit to Solomon are recorded, be converted into an allegory, a moral fiction, or a popular tradition? The two cases, as adduced by our Lord, are altogether parallel; and the same may be affirmed of the allusion to Tyre and Sidon, and that to Sodom in the preceding chapter. It may be said, indeed, that a fictitious narrative of the moral kind would answer the purpose of our Saviour equally well with one which contained a statement of real transactions, just as it has been maintained that the reference made by the apostle James to the patience of Job suited his purpose, irrespective of the actual existence of that patriarch; but as, in the one case, a fictitious example of patience would prove only a tame and frigid motive to induce to the endurance of actual suffering, so, in the other, a merely imaginary repentance must be regarded as little calculated to enforce the duties of genuine contrition and amendment of life. Certainly in no other instance in which our Saviour adduces passages out of the Old Testament, for the purpose of illustrating or confirming his doctrines can it be shewn that any point or circumstance is thus employed which is not historically true. He uniformly quotes and reasons upon them as containing accounts of universally admitted facts, stamps them as such with the high sanction of his Divine authority, and transmits them for the confident belief of mankind in all future ages.—H. Jerome informs us that the prophet's sepulchre was shewn at Gath-hepher in his time. The orientals now shew his tomb at Mosul, where the Turks have built a mosque, in which they pretend to possess his relics; while others who reside at Gath-hepher, now a little bourgade, shew a mausoleum of Jonah in a subterranean chapel, inclosed in a mosque, and compel travellers to enter it barefoot. Such are the contests of superstitious reverence on the claims of mercenary rivalship. The fame of Jonah's deliverance appears to have spread among the heathen nations; and the Greeks, who were accustomed to adorn the memory of their heroes by every remarkable event and embellishment which they could appropriate, added to the fictitious adventures of Hercules that of having continued three days, without injury, in the belly of a dog, (καρχαρος κυων,—'dog fish,') sent against him by Neptune. The fable of Arion and the dolphin, of which the date is fixed at a time coeval with the period of Jonah, is possibly a representation of particulars recorded in the sacred book.—Bp. Gray's Key. See Supplementary Notes on Nahum.

Chap. I.—2. Nineveh, that great city. Supplementary Note on ch. iii. 2, 3. 3. To flee to Tarshish—and went down to Joppa. Joppa, (Yafa,) stands on a rocky hill of an oblong shape, on the east coast of the Mediterranean, at the distance of ten (or about thirty-two or thirty-three miles) hours from Jerusalem, of which it may be said to be the sea-port. The houses and streets rise regularly according to the elevation of the different strata forming the site of the buildings. In the Armenian convent of this place Buonaparte poisoned his sick soldiers. The harbour, which is close to the town, is surrounded by rocks, and is quite inadequate to afford shelter to vessels of any considerable size. The Jews at Joppa consist of twenty-six families, with one hundred and twenty souls,—an insignificant portion of the population of Joppa, which, exclusive of the military, may be reckoned at five thousand souls. We found two Jews from Egypt, and one from Bagdad. We put the question to them, 'To what Tarshish do you think the prophet Jonah attempted to go when he set sail from Joppa?' Their reply was satisfactory enough, 'To Tarsus of Cilicia.'—Lands of the Bible. Dr. Kitto prefers Tartessus in Spain, stating, among other reasons for his opinion, that Tartessus belonged to the Phœnicians, between whom and the inhabitants of Joppa there was constant intercourse. 14. Let us not perish for this man's life. There is a parallel passage in the Argonautics of Orpheus, which has been quoted by Bishop Newcome in illustration of this:

'And much they doubted in their prudent minds,
Whether to kill, and cast a prey to fishes,
Wretched Medea, and avert their fate.'

Attributing to the presence of Medea the storm that assailed the Argo. 17. Now the Lord had prepared a great fish. It has been supposed by some that the fish here spoken of was created at the moment, for the purpose of swallowing the prophet, though, according to Rabbi Tarphon, it was prepared for the purpose at the creation of the world; but there is nothing in the original word which at all suggests the idea of creation or production. It properly signifies, to appoint, order, arrange, and the like, so that all that can be legitimately inferred from its use in this place is, that, in the providence of God, the animal was brought to the spot at the precise time when Jonah was thrown into the sea, and its instrumentality was wanted for his deliverance. In other words, it was the result of a special pre-arrangement in the Divine plan, according to which the movements of all creatures are regulated, and rendered subservient to the purposes of God's universal government. On the subject of the fish itself various opinions have been broached; but the Scriptures leave it entirely undecided to what species of marine animals the fish belonged, merely stating that it was 'a great fish,' one sufficiently large for the occasion.—H. They who undertake to explain every thing in a transaction of this nature perform a work of very great supererogation. As a whole, the narrative presents fewer difficulties than many of the other miracles recorded in Scripture. The greatest difficulty may be to find by what provision Jonah was preserved from suffocation. And for this it is not necessary to account. "Is any thing too hard for the Lord?" And to the Lord it was not harder to preserve Jonah in the belly of the fish than the three youths at Babylon in the midst of the "burning fiery furnace." They who believe that the Almighty has, at sundry times and in divers manners, exercised powers beyond the ordinary course of the laws which he has appointed to govern nature, will find no difficulties; and those who do not believe this have read the Bible, if they do read it, to little purpose. Our limits do not allow us to investigate the subject more fully; but we may refer the reader to Calmet's Dissertation sur Jonas, the Dissertations in Gleig's edition of Stackhouse, and Bishop Jebb's Sacred Literature. Three days and three nights. This by no means necessarily implies three entire days and nights, but would be true if understood of one complete day, and any part, however small, of two others. Thus our Saviour, who lay in the tomb from Friday evening to Sunday morning, is said to have lain three days and nights in the grave. And that the present text should be similarly understood is the more probable, from the remarkable text in which the Son of man makes this situation of Jonah a type of his own sojourn for "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," Mat. xii. 40.—Pictorial Bible. The following remarks are from M'Ewen. A greater than Jonah is here pointed forth, in his death, burial, resurrection, and preaching to the Gentiles. The casting forth of Jonah into the sea much resembles the death of Christ, though in some circumstances there is a considerable difference; for the prophet Jonah was, for his own offences, delivered into the hands of mariners, who, without being guilty of a murder, reluctantly, and for their own preservation, threw him overboard, beseeching that his blood might not be laid to their charge. But Christ being delivered, not for his own but our offences, unto the Jews and Gentiles, was crucified, while his murderers imprecated the vengeance of his innocent blood to fall on themselves and their children. In other respects the circumstances respecting Christ and Jonah are more alike. With his own consent the prophet is cast forth into the sea, acknowledging he was the man for whom the storm was sent; so Christ voluntarily laid down his life, saying to those who were sent to apprehend him, "I am the man whom ye seek." The sufferings of the prophet, when thrown into the sea, were attended with happy consequences to the seamen,—the stilling of the tempest, preserving their lives, and, as it is to be hoped, the salvation of their souls; so, when Christ expired on the cross, this apparently tragical event produced the most blessed results, saving from destruction those for whom he gave his life, some of whom were the instruments of his death. Jonah's being in the belly of the fish three days and nights corresponds to the burial of our Redeemer. Never did that monster of the deep swallow such a morsel before; nor ever did the grave inclose such a prisoner as Jesus was. Jonah, indeed, was not really dead, as Christ was, when in the heart of the earth; but as that dismal place much resembled the horrors of the grave, and is styled the belly of hell by the prophet, perhaps the circumstance of Jonah's being alive in that sepulchre may remind us that Jesus was the living God, even when he was a dead man; for, though death was able to rend his soul and body from one another, neither were dissevered from his Divine person. And as Jonah received no harm, which was miraculous if we consider the powers of the stomach of so large a creature, so Christ, when lying in the grave, saw no corruption. His casting forth on the third day at the command of the Lord answers to the resurrection of the Son of God at the command of his Father. When Jonah was saved from the fish he was saved from the sea; when Christ was rescued from the grave he emerged from those billows of his Father's wrath which had passed over his head. It was not possible that Jonah should be detained in his dungeon when the Lord spake to the fish; it was not possible that Christ should be held by the cords of death longer than the appointed time. Nevertheless, in all things Jesus must have the pre-eminence, and we must acknowledge that "a greater than Jonas is here," Mat. xii. 41; for, whereas Jonah did not contribute in the least to his own restoration, our Redeemer, on the other hand, as he had power to lay down his life, had power to take it again. The fish that swallowed Jonah might receive as little harm by the prophet as the prophet by the fish; but, O grave, he was thy destruction! Never any descended into the grave but it was able to digest them, till Christ died and was buried. This grand devourer, snatching the bait of his human body, was not aware of the hook of his Divine nature, and was first to surrender his prey, having received such a deadly wound as shall never be healed. Jonah's preaching to the Ninevites, and saving them from destruction, corresponds to Christ's preaching to the Gentiles by his apostles, after his resurrection from the dead. For the gracious design of preserving a guilty city by turning them from their evil ways was the prophet preserved in the monster's belly, and revisited the light on the third day; for the same merciful purpose was Jesus raised from the dead, to save a guilty world from death, and to bless them in turning away every one of them from their iniquities. Was not the belief those poor Gentiles gave to the preaching of the prophet, and their speedy repentance, a prelude to the quick reception the doctrine of Jesus Christ should meet with among those who were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel? On this occasion the prophet acted a most unworthy part, and shewed greater regard to his own reputation than to the salvation of his hearers. In this Jonah is not a type of Christ, who wept over Jerusalem, not because they repented, but because they repented not. On this account, as well as those formerly mentioned, we may well say, "a greater than Jonas is here." Thus, as Mather observes, Jonah is a partial, not a complete type of Christ.—Religious Tract Society's Bible.

CHAP. II.—3. All thy billows and waves passed over me. The hymn which commences here is partly descriptive, partly precatory, and partly eucharistical. That the language, not only of the prayer, but also of the introduction, is in part borrowed from the Psalms, appears from the following comparison: Ps. cxx. 1, with ver. 3; Ps. xlii. 8, ver. 4; Ps. xxxi. 23, ver. 5; Ps. lxix. 2, ver. 6; Ps. cxii. 4, ver. 8; Ps. xxxi. 7, ver. 9; Ps. iii. 9, ver. 10. On the supposition that Jonah was familiar with the Psalms, it was very natural for him to incorporate sentences taken from them with his own language, just as we frequently do in extempore prayer, without thinking of the portion of Scripture from which they are derived. On reviewing this prayer, and weighing the import of its several terms, it is obvious that, though Jonah was in a state of consciousness while in the belly of the fish, he had no idea that such was his situation. On the contrary, he appears to have been under the impression that he was ingulfed in the sea, now forcibly carried along by its current, now entangled among its weeds, and now sinking into the profound ravines of its rocks.—H.

CHAP. III.—2, 3. Nineveh that great city—an exceeding great city of three days journey. Supposing a journey on foot to be intended, or a caravan march, the distance will range from forty-five to sixty miles. It is not stated whether we are to apply this distance to a direct passage through the city from one extremity to the other, or to the compass of its walls; but as the former supposition gives incredible dimensions, and the latter only an extent equal to that assigned by profane authorities, its circuit is no doubt meant. The walls of Nineveh circumscribed an area equal to that of Babylon. Diodorus Siculus states its dimensions at one hundred and fifty stadia long, ninety broad, and four hundred and eighty in circumference. Herodotus, in measuring the royal road from Sardis to Susa, allows one hundred and fifty stadia for a day's journey. This is the length ascribed to Nineveh, the distance compassed, according to the view given, in the days' journey of Jonah; and the representation of it, as a city of three days' journey in circuit, and its assigned circumference of four hundred and eighty stadia, are closely coincident, especially when we remember that the Greeks, in estimating distances, allowed a certain number of stadia to every day, independent of the casual hindrances or facilities that might arise to progress. In the regions of civilization no parallel case exists, or what may be deemed an approximation to it, of a city occupying such an extent of ground. But we are not to frame our ideas of the eastern and ancient from the western and modern, and look to our closely packed towns and condensed population as samples of the arrangement of things three thousand years ago in Central Asia. Not London or Paris, but Ispahan and Pekin, will shape our imaginations rightly. Babylon, we know, was very loosely built. The dwellings were usually detached, as a security in case of fire. There were large open spaces for pleasure and cultivation, and a sufficient quantity of ground for tillage to sustain the inhabitants a considerable time if shut up within their walls. We may read then without surprise concerning the extent of Nineveh, inclosing parks, plantations, gardens, lands for pasturage and tillage, as many of the oriental towns now do upon a smaller scale. In the Divine rebuke administered to the prophet, dissatisfied at the city being spared, the reference to "much cattle" within its bounds corroborates the view taken of its structure. Fifteen hundred towers, each two hundred feet in height, crowned the walls of the city, rendering its defences so strong as to be deemed impregnable. The walls themselves were a hundred feet high, and so broad that three chariots might be driven upon them abreast. This is the testimony of profane antiquity; and the references of the Jewish prophets to the "rejoicing city that sat in security," the "fenced place," the "stronghold," the "valiant men and chariots," the "silver and gold," the "pleasant furniture," "carved lintels," and "cedar work," convey the idea of great material strength and grandeur. The population bore no proportion to the area occupied, like that which belongs to our modern cities. Of this we have indisputable evidence, (ch. iv. 11,) "Sixscore thousand persons, that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand," are mentioned among its inhabitants—a proverbial expression for young children. Following the usual rate of calculation, this will give only six hundred thousand souls for the entire population, which we may increase to seven hundred thousand, as the number of children is said to have exceeded the number specified. This amount of human occupation of such a space would leave ample room for every dwelling to be apart, and corresponds Nineveh to the suburban aspect of one of our towns, rather than to the closely piled and densely peopled interior.—Lowe's Edin. Mag. for Feb. and April, 1847, edited by an eminent clergyman. To this work we are also partly indebted for the Note on Zep. ii. 13—15. 5. So the men of Nineveh believed God. There were no outward indications of the overthrow of Nineveh, and Jonah wrought no miracle in confirmation of his prediction, yet the Ninevites believed it to be the word of God, and that it would be verified, probably through a conviction excited in their minds of the greatness of their guilt, and from a recollection of the many wonderful judgments that Israel's God had inflicted on his enemies. Perhaps they had also heard of the wonderful things which God had wrought in respect of Jonah.—Scott. The fame of the wonderful works God had wrought for the Jews was spread over the eastern parts of the world. This might make the Ninevites hearken to a man of that nation, that came to them as sent by God; and it is likely that he gave them an account of the miraculous circumstances which attended his own mission. But, without question, a sense of their own guilt, and their deserving whatever punishment heaven could inflict, was a principal reason that moved them to have regard to his message. And by the men of Nineveh's repenting at the preaching of Jonah, God designed to upbraid the stubbornness of his people, and shame them, as it were, into repentance, for fear the men of Nineveh should rise up in judgment against them, Mat. xii. 41.—Lowth.

AN

OF THE

PROPHECY OF MICAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We shall have some account of this prophet in the first verse of the book of his prophecy, and therefore shall here only observe that, being contemporary with the prophet Isaiah, (only that he began to prophecy a little after him,) there is a near resemblance between that prophet's prophecy and this; and there is a prediction of the advancement and establishment of the gospel church, which both of them have, almost in the same words, that out of the mouth of two such witnesses so great a word might be established: compare Isa. ii. 2, 3, with ch. iv. 1, 2. Isaiah's prophecy is said to be concerning Judah and Jerusalem, but Micah's concerning Samaria and Jerusalem; for, though this prophecy be dated only by the reigns of the kings of Judah, yet it refers to the kingdom of Israel, the approaching ruin of which, in the captivity of the ten tribes, he plainly foretells, and sadly laments. What we find here in writing was but an abstract of the sermons he preached during the reign of the three kings. The scope of the whole is, I. To convince sinners of their sins, by setting them in order before them, charging both Israel and Judah with idolatry, covetousness, oppression, contempt of the word of God; and their rulers especially, both in church and state, with the abuse of their power; and also by shewing them the judgments of God ready to break in upon them for their sins. II. To comfort God's people with promises of mercy and deliverance, especially with an assurance of the coming of the Messiah, and of the grace of the Gospel through him. It is remarkable concerning this prophecy, and confirms its authority, that we find two quotations out of it made publicly upon very solemn occasions, both referring to very great events. 1. One is a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, ch. iii. 12, which we find quoted in the Old Testament, by the elders of the land, Jer. xxvi. 17, 18, in justification of Jeremiah, when he foretold the judgments of God coming upon Jerusalem, and to stay the proceedings of the court against him. Micah, say they, foretold that Zion should be ploughed as a field, and Hezekiah did not put him to death, why then should we punish Jeremiah for saying the same? 2. Another is a prediction of the birth of Christ, ch. v. 2, which we find quoted in the New Testament, by the chief priests and scribes of the people, in answer to Herod's inquiry, where Christ should be born? Mat. ii. 5, 6; for still we find that to him bare all the prophets witness.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The title of the book, ver. 1, and a preface demanding attention, ver. 2. II. Warning given of desolating judgments, hastening upon the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, ver. 3, 4; and all for sin, ver. 5. III. The particulars of the destruction instanced, ver. 6, 7. IV. The greatness of the destruction illustrated, 1. By the prophet's sorrow for it, ver. 8, 9; 2. By the general sorrow that should be for it, in the several places that must expect to share in it, ver. 10—16. These prophecies of Micah might well be called his lamentations.

THE word of the LORD that came to Micah the Morasthite in the days of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, which he saw concerning Samaria and Jerusalem.

2 Hear, all ye people;
Hearken, O earth, and all that therein is:
And let the Lord GOD be The Lord from his holy temple. [witness against you,

3 For, behold, the LORD cometh forth out of his place,
And will come down, and tread upon the high places of the earth.

4 And the mountains shall be molten under him,
And the valleys shall be cleft,
As wax before the fire,
And as the waters that are poured down a steep place.

5 For the transgression of Jacob is all this,
And for the sins of the house of Israel.
What is the transgression of Jacob? is it not Samaria?
And what are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem?

6 Therefore I will make Samaria as an heap of the field,
And as plantings of a vineyard:
And I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley,
And I will discover the foundations thereof. [pieces,

7 And all the graven images thereof shall be beaten to
And all the hires thereof shall be burned with the fire,
And all the idols thereof will I lay desolate:
For she gathered it of the hire of an harlot,
And they shall return to the hire of an harlot.

Here is, First. A general account of this prophet and his prophecy, ver. 1. This is prefixed for the satisfaction of all that read and hear the prophecy of this book, who will give the more credit to it when they know the author and his authority.

1. The prophecy is "the word of the Lord;" it is a Divine revelation. Note, What is written in the Bible, and what is preached by the ministers of Christ, according to what was written there, must be heard and received, not as the word of dying men, which we may be judges of, but as the word of the living God, which we must be judged by, for so it is. This word of the Lord came to the prophet, came plainly, came powerfully, came in a preventing way, and he saw it, saw the vision in which it was conveyed to him, saw the things themselves which he foretold with as much clearness and certainty as if they had been already accomplished.

2. The prophet is Micah the Morasthite; his name Micah, a contraction of Micaiah, the name of a prophet some ages before, in Ahab's time, 1 Kin. xxii. 8. His surname was, the Morasthite, born or lived at Moresheth, which is mentioned here, ver. 13; or Mareshah, which is mentioned, ver. 15, and Jos. xv. 44. The place of his abode is mentioned, that any one might inquire in that place at that time, and might find there was, or had been, such a one there, who was generally reputed to be a prophet.

3. The date of his prophecy is in the reigns of three kings of Judah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Ahaz was one of the worst of Judah's kings, and Hezekiah one of the best; such variety of times pass over God's ministers, times that frown and times that smile, to each of which they must study to accommodate themselves, and to arm themselves against the temptations of both. The promises and threatenings of this book are interwoven, by which it appears that even in the wicked reign he preached comfort, and said to the righteous then, it shall be well with them; and in the pious reign he preached conviction, and said to the wicked then, it shall be ill with them; for, however the times change, the word of the Lord is still the same.

4. The parties concerned in this prophecy. It is concerning Samaria and Jerusalem, the head cities of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah, under the influence of which the kingdoms themselves were. Though the ten tribes have deserted the houses both of David and Aaron, yet God is pleased to send prophets to them.

Secondly. A very solemn introduction to the following prophecy, ver. 2. In which,

1. The people are summoned to draw near and give their attendance, as upon a court of judicature; "Hear all ye people." Note, Where God has a mouth to speak we must have an ear to hear; we all must, for we are all concerned in what is delivered. 'Hear, ye people, all of them,' so the margin reads it; all ye that are now within hearing, and all others that hear it at second hand. It is an unusual construction; but those words with which Micah begins his prophecy are the very same in the original with those wherewith Micaiah ended his, 1 Kin. xxii. 28.

2. The earth is called upon, with all that therein is, to hear what the prophet has to say. "Hearken, O earth." The earth shall be made to shake under the stroke and weight of the judgments coming. Sooner will the earth hear than this stupid senseless people; but God will be heard when he pleads. If the church and those in it will not hear, the earth and those in it shall, and shame them.

3. God himself is appealed to, and his omniscience, power and justice, are vouched in testimony against this people. "Let the Lord God be witness against you," a witness that you had fair warning given you, that your prophets did their duty faithfully as watchmen, but you would not take the warning; let the accomplishment of the prophecy be a witness against your contempt and disbelief of it, and prove to your conviction and confusion that it was the word of God, and no word of his shall fall to the ground. Note, God himself will be a witness by the judgments of his hand against those that would not receive his testimony in the judgments of his mouth; he will be a witness "from his holy temple" in heaven, when he comes down to execute judgment, ver. 3, against those that turned a deaf ear to his oracles, wherein he witnessed to them out of his holy temple at Jerusalem.

Thirdly. A terrible prediction of destroying judgments, which should come upon Judah and Israel, which had its accomplishment soon after in Israel, and at length in Judah. For it is foretold,

1. That God himself will appear against them, ver. 3. They boast of themselves and their relation to God, as if that would secure them; but, though God never deceives the faith of the upright, he will disappoint the presumption of the hypocrites, for "behold the Lord cometh forth out of his place," quits his mercy-seat, where they thought they had him fast, and prepares his throne for judgment. His glory departs, for they drive it from them. God's way towards this people had long been a way of mercy; but now he changeth his way, he comes out of his place, and will come down. He had seemed to retire, as one regardless of what was done, but now he will shew himself, he will rend the heavens, and will come down; not as sometimes in surprising mercies, but in surprising judgments, to do things, not for them, but against them, which they looked not for, Isa. xxvi. 21; lxiv. 1.

2. That when the Creator appears against them, it shall be in vain for any creature to appear for them. He will tread with contempt and disdain upon the high places of the earth, upon all the powers that are advanced in competition with him, or in opposition to him; and he will so tread upon them as to tread them down, and level them. High places set up for the worship of idols, or for military fortifications, shall all be trodden down and trampled into the dust. Do men trust to the height and strength of the mountains and rocks, as if they were sufficient to bear up their hopes, and bear off their fears? They shall be "molten under him," melted down "as wax before the fire," Ps. lxviii. 2. Do they trust to the fruitfulness of the valleys and their products? They shall be cleft or rent, with those fiery streams that shall come pouring down from the mountains when they are melted. They shall be ploughed and wasted away, as the ground is by the waters that are "poured down a steep place." God is said to "cleave the earth with rivers," Hab. iii. 9. Neither men of high degree, as the mountains, nor men of low degree, as the valleys, shall be able to secure either themselves or the land from the judgments of God, when they are sent with commission to lay all waste, and, like a sweeping rain, to leave no food, Pr. xxviii. 3. This is applied particularly to the head city of Israel, which they hoped would be a protection to the kingdom; ver. 6, "I will make Samaria," that is now a rich and populous city, as "a heap of the field," as a heap of dung laid there to be spread, or as a heap of stones gathered together to be carried away, and "as plantings of a vineyard," as hillocks of earth raised to plant vines in. God will make of that city a heap, of that "defenced city a ruin," Isa. xxv. 2. Their altars had been as "heaps in the furrows of the fields," Hos. xii. 11, and now their houses shall be so, as ruinous heaps. The stones of the city are poured down into the valley by the fury of the conqueror, who will thus be revenged on those walls that so long held out against him. They shall be quite pulled down, so that the very foundations shall be discovered that had been covered by the superstructure; and not one stone shall be left upon another.

Fourthly. A charge of sin upon them, as the procuring cause of these desolating judgments; ver. 5, "For the transgression of Jacob is all this." If it be asked why God is so angry, and why Jacob and Israel are thus brought to ruin by his anger, the answer is ready, Sin has done all the mischief. Sin hath laid all waste; all the calamities of Jacob and Israel are owing to their transgressions; if they had not gone away from God, he had never appeared thus against them. Note, External privileges and professions will not secure a sinful people from the judgments of God. If sin be found in the house of Israel, if Jacob be guilty of transgression and rebellion, God will not spare them; no, he will punish them first, for their sins are of all other most provoking to him, for they are most reproaching; but it is asked, "What is the transgression of Jacob?" Note, When we feel the smart of sin, it concerns us to inquire what the sin is we smart for, that we may particularly war against that which wars against us. And what is that?

1. It is idolatry; it is the high places. That is the transgression, the great transgression which reigns in Israel, that spiritual whoredom, the violation of the marriage covenant, which merits a divorce. Even the high places of Judah, though not so bad as the transgression of Jacob, were yet offensive enough to God, and a remaining blemish upon some of the good reigns. "Howbeit the high places were not taken away."

2. It is the idolatry of Samaria and Jerusalem, the royal cities of these two kingdoms. Those were the most populous places, and where there were most people there was most wickedness, and they made one another worse; these were the most pompous places, there men lived most in wealth and pleasure, and they forgat God. These were the places that had the greatest influence upon the country by authority and example, so that from them idolatry and "profaneness went forth throughout all the land," Jer. xxiii. 15. Note, Spiritual distempers are most contagious in persons and places that are most conspicuous. If the head city of a kingdom, or the chief family in a parish, be vicious and profane, many will follow their pernicious ways, and write after an ill copy, when great ones set it them. The vices of leaders and rulers are leading ruling vices, and therefore shall be surely and sorely punished. Those have a great deal to answer for indeed, that not only sin, but make Israel to sin. Those must expect to be made examples that have been examples of wickedness. If the transgression of Jacob is Samaria, therefore shall Samaria become a heap. Let ringleaders in sin hear this and fear.

Fifthly. The punishment made to answer the sin is, the particular destruction of the idols, ver. 7.

1. The gods they worshipped shall be destroyed; the "graven images shall be beaten to pieces" by the army of the Assyrians, and all the idols shall be laid desolate. Samaria and her idols were ruined together by Sennacherib, Isa. x. 11, and "their gods cast into the fire," for "they were no gods," Isa. xxxvii. 19; and this was the Lord's doing: "I will lay the idols desolate." Note, If the law of God prevail not to make men in authority destroy idols, God will take the work into his own hands, and will do it himself.

2. The gifts that passed between them and their gods shall be destroyed; for "all the hires thereof shall be burnt with fire." Which may be meant either of the presents they made to their idols, for the replenishing of their altars, and the adorning of their statues and temples,—these shall become a prey to the victorious army, that shall rifle not only private houses, but the houses of their gods; or of the corn, and wine, and oil, which they called the rewards or hires which their idols, their lovers, gave them, Hos. ii. 12,—these shall be taken from them, by him whom (by ascribing them to their dear idols) they have defrauded of the honour due to him. Note, That cannot prosper by which men are either hired to sin or hire others to sin; for the wages of sin will be death. "She gathered it of the hire of the harlot, and it shall return to the hire of the harlot." They enriched themselves by their leagues with the idolatrous nations, who gave them advantages to court them into the service of their idols; and their idols' temples were enriched with gifts, by those that went a whoring after them; and all this wealth shall become a prey to the idolatrous nations, and so be the hire of a harlot again, wages to an army of idolaters, who shall take it as a reward given them by their gods; "It shall be a present to king Jareb," Hos. x. 6. What they gave to their idols, and what they thought they got by them, shall be as the hire of a harlot; that is, the curse of God shall be upon it, and it shall never prosper, or do them any good. It is common that what is squeezed out by one lust is squandered away upon another.

8 Therefore I will wail and howl,
I will go stripped and naked:
I will make a wailing like the dragons,
And mourning as the owls.
9 For her wound is incurable;
For it is come unto Judah; [lem.

15 Yet will I bring an heir unto thee, O inhabitant of Mareshah:
He shall come unto Adullam the glory of Israel.
16 Make thee bald, and poll thee for thy delicate children;
Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle;
For they are gone into captivity from thee.

We have here a long train of mourners attending the funeral of a ruined kingdom.

First. The prophet is himself chief mourner; ver. 8, 9, "I will wail and howl, I will go stripped and naked," as a man distracted with grief. The prophets usually expressed their own grief for the public grievances, partly to mollify the predictions of them, and to make it appear it was not out of ill-will they denounced the judgments of God,—so far were they from desiring the woful day that they dreaded it more than any thing; partly to show how dreadful and mournful the calamities would be, and to stir up in the people a holy fear of them, that by repentance they might turn away the wrath of God. Note, We ought to lament the punishments of sinners as well as the sufferings of saints in this world; the weeping prophet did so, Jer. ix. 1. So did this prophet: he "makes a wailing like the dragons," or rather, jackalls, ravenous beasts, that in those countries used to meet in the night, and howl, and make hideous noises; he mourns as the owls, the screech owls, or ostriches, as some read it. Two things the prophet here thus dolefully laments.

1. That Israel's case is desperate. "Her wound is incurable," it is ruin without remedy. Man cannot help her, God will not, because she will not by repentance and reformation help herself. There is indeed balm in Gilead, and a physician there; but they will not apply themselves to the physician, nor apply the balm to themselves, and therefore the wound is incurable.

2. That Judah likewise is in danger. The cup is going round, and is now put into Judah's hand; the enemy is come to the gate of Jerusalem. Soon after the destruction of Samaria, and the ten tribes, the Assyrian army under Sennacherib laid siege to Jerusalem, came to the gate, but could not force their way any farther. However, it was with great concern and trouble that the prophet foresaw the fright, so dearly did he love the peace of Jerusalem.

Secondly. Other places are here brought in mourning, and are called upon to mourn, but with this proviso, that they should not let the Philistines hear them; ver. 10, "Declare it not in Gath." This is borrowed from David's lamentation for Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 20, "Tell it not in Gath," for the uncircumcised will triumph in Israel's tears. Note, One would not, if it could be helped, gratify those that make themselves and their companions merry with the sins or with the sorrows of God's Israel. David was silent, and stifled his griefs, when the wicked were before him, Ps. xxxix. 1. But, though it may be prudent not to give way to a noisy sorrow, yet it is a duty to admit a silent one when the church of God is in distress. "Roll thyself in the dust," as great mourners used to do, and so let the house of Judah, and every house in Jerusalem, become a house of Aphrah, a house of dust, covered with dust, crumbled into dust. When God makes the house dust, it becomes us to humble ourselves under his mighty hand, and to put our mouths in the dust, thus accommodating ourselves to the providences that are concerning us. Dust we are; God brings us to the dust that we may know it, and own it. Divers other places are here named that should be sharers in this universal mourning, the names of some of which we do not find elsewhere; whence it is conjectured that they are names put upon them by the prophet, the signification of which might either indicate or aggravate the miseries coming upon them; thereby to awaken this secure and stupid people to a holy fear of Divine wrath. We find Sennacherib's invasion thus described in the prediction of it, by the impressions of terror it should make upon the several cities that fell in his way, Isa. x. 28, 29, &c. Let us observe the particulars here:

1. The inhabitants of Saphir, which signifies, 'neat and beautiful,' ('Thou that dwellest fairly,' so the margin reads it,) shall pass away into captivity, or be forced to flee, stripped of their ornaments, and "having their shame naked." Note, Those who appear never so fine and delicate know not what contempt they may be exposed to; and the more grievous will the shame be to those that have been the inhabitants of Saphir.

2. The inhabitants of Zaanan, which signifies 'the country of flocks,' a populous country, where the people are as numerous and thick as flocks of sheep, shall yet be so taken up with their own calamities, felt or feared, that they shall not "come forth in the mourning of Bethezel," which signifies 'a place near,' shall not condole with, or bring any succour to, their next neighbours in distress; for "he shall receive of you his standing," the enemy shall encamp among you, O inhabitants of Zaanan, shall take up a station there, shall find footing among you. They may well think themselves excused from helping their neighbours that find they have enough to do to help themselves, and to hold their own.

3. As for the inhabitants of Maroth, which some think is Ramoth, others that it signifies the rough places, they "waited carefully for good," and were grieved for the want of it, but were disappointed; for "evil came from the Lord, unto the gate of Jerusalem," when the Assyrian army besieged it, ver. 12. The inhabitants of Maroth might well overlook their own particular grievances, when they saw the holy city itself in danger; and might well overlook the Assyrian, that was the instrument, when they saw the evil coming from the Lord.

4. Lachish was a city of Judah, which Sennacherib laid siege to, Isa. xxxvi. 1, 2. The inhabitants of that city are called to "bind the chariot to the swift beast;" to prepare for a speedy flight, as having no other way left to secure themselves and their families. Or, it is spoken ironically: You have had your chariots and swift beasts, but where are they now? God's quarrel with Lachish is, that "she is the beginning of the sin," probably the sin of idolatry, to the daughter of Zion, ver. 13. They had learned it from the ten tribes, their near neighbours, and so infected the two tribes with it. Note, Those that help to bring sin into a country do but thereby prepare for the throwing of themselves out of it. They must expect to be first in the punishment that have been ringleaders in sin. "The transgressions of Israel were found in thee;" that is, when they came to be traced up to their original, they were found to take rise very much from that city. God knows at whose door to lay the blame of the transgressions of Israel, and whom to find guilty. Lachish having been so much accessary to the sin of Israel shall certainly be reckoned with; "Thou shalt give presents to Moresheth-gath," a city of the Philistines, which perhaps had a dependence upon Gath, that famous Philistine city. Thou shalt send to court those of that city to assist thee, but it shall be in vain; for, ver. 14, "The houses of Achzib," (a city which joined to Mareshah, or Moresheth, and is mentioned with it, Jos. xv. 44,) "shall be a lie to the kings of Israel;" though they depend upon their strength, yet they shall fail them. Here there is an allusion to the name; Achzib signifies 'a lie,' and so it shall prove to those that trust in it.

5. Mareshah, that could not or would not help Israel, shall herself be made a prey; ver. 15, "I will bring an heir," that is, an enemy, that shall take possession of thy lands, with as much assurance as if he were heir-at-law to them; and he "shall come to Adullam," and "to the glory of Israel," that is, to Jerusalem, the head city. Or, the glory of Israel shall come to be as Adullam, a poor, despicable place. Or, the king of Assyria, whom Israel had gloried in, shall come to Adullam in laying the country waste.

6. The whole land of Judah seems to be spoken to, ver. 16, and called to weeping and mourning, "Make thee bald," by tearing thy hair, and shaving thy head; "poll thee for thy delicate children," that had been tenderly and nicely brought up. "Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle," when she casts her feathers, and is all over bald, "for they are gone into captivity" from thee, and are not like to return. And their captivity will be the more grievous to them, because they have been brought up delicately, and have not been inured to hardship. Or this is directed particularly to the inhabitants of Mareshah, as ver. 15. That was the prophet's own city, and yet he denounceth the judgments of God against it; for it shall be an aggravation of its sin, that it had such a prophet, and knew not the day of its visitation. Its being thus privileged, since it improved not the privilege, shall not procure favour for it, either with God or his prophet.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have, I. The sins with which the people of Israel are charged, covetousness and oppression, fraudulent and violent practices, ver. 1—2; dealing barbarously, even with women and children, and other harmless people, ver. 8, 9; opposition of God's prophets, and silencing them, ver. 6, 7; and delighting in false prophets, ver. 11. II. The judgments with which they are threatened for these sins, that they should be humbled and impoverished, ver. 3—5; and banished, ver. 10. III. Gracious promises of comfort reserved for the good people among them, in the Messiah, ver. 12, 13. And this is the sum and scope of most of the chapters of this and other prophecies.

WOE to them that devise iniquity,
And work evil upon their beds!
When the morning is light, they practise it,
Because it is in the power of their hand.
2 And they covet fields, and take them by violence;
And houses, and take them away:
So they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage.
3 Therefore thus saith the LORD;
Behold, against this family do I devise an evil,
From which ye shall not remove your necks;
Neither shall ye go haughtily: for this time is evil.
4 In that day shall one take up a parable against you,
And lament with a doleful lamentation,
And say, We be utterly spoiled:
He hath changed the portion of my people:
How hath he removed it from me!
Turning away he hath divided our fields.
5 Therefore thou shalt have none that shall cast a cord by lot
In the congregation of the LORD.

Here is, First. The injustice of man contriving the evil of sin, ver. 1, 2. God was coming forth against this people to destroy them; and here he shews what was the ground of his controversy with them: it is that which is often mentioned as a sin, that hastens the ruin of nations and families as much as any other, the sin of oppression. Let us see the steps of it.

1. They eagerly desire that which is not their own,—that is the root of bitterness, the root of all evil; ver. 2, "They covet fields and houses," as Ahab did Naboth's vineyard. O that such a one's field and house were mine! It lies convenient for me, and I would manage it better than he doth; it is fitter for me than for him.

2. They set their wits to work to invent ways of accomplishing their desires, ver. 1. They devise iniquity with a great deal of cursed art and policy; they plot how to do it effectually, and yet so as not to expose themselves, or bring themselves into danger, or under reproach by it. This is called working evil; they are working it in their heads, in their families, and are as intent upon it, and with as much pleasure, as if they were doing it; and are as confident of their success (so wisely do they think they have laid the scheme) as if it were then assuredly done. Note, It is bad to do mischief upon a sudden thought, but much worse to devise it, to do it with design and deliberation; when the craft and subtlety of the old serpent appears with his poison and venom it is wickedness in perfection. They devised it "upon their beds," when they should have been asleep; care to compass a mischievous design held their eyes waking: upon their beds, where they should have been remembering God, and meditating upon him, where they should have been communing with their own hearts, and examining them, they were devising iniquity. It is of great consequence to us how we improve and employ the hours of our retirement and solitude.

3. They employ their power in executing what they have designed and contrived. They practise the iniquity they have devised, "because it is in the power of their hand." They find they can compass it by the help of their wealth, and the authority and interest they have, and that none dare control them, or call them to an account for it; and this they think will justify them, and bear them out in it. Note, It is the mistake of many to think, as they can do they may do; whereas no power is given for destruction, but all for edification.

4. They are industrious and very expeditious in accomplishing the iniquity they have devised. When they have settled the matter in their thoughts in their beds they lose no time, but as soon as the morning is light they practise it; are up early in the prosecution of their designs, and what ill their hands find to do they do it with all their might, which shames our slothfulness and dilatoriness in doing good, and should shame us out of it. In the service of God and our generation let it never be said we left that to be done to-morrow which we could do to-day.

5. They stick at nothing to compass their designs; what they covet they take away if they can. And, 1st. They care not what wrong they do, though it be never so gross and open; they take away men's fields by violence, not only by fraud and underhand practices, and colour of law, but by force and with a high hand. 2nd. They care not whom they do wrong to, nor how far the iniquity extends which they devise; they "oppress a man and his house," they rob and ruin those that have numerous families to maintain, and are not concerned though they send them and their wives and children a begging. They "oppress a man and his heritage;" they take away from men that which they have an unquestionable title to, having received it from their ancestors, and which they have but in trust to transmit it to their posterity; but those oppressors care not how many they impoverish, so they may but enrich themselves. Note, If covetousness reigns in the heart, commonly all compassion is banished from it; and if any man love this world, as the love of the Father, so the love of his neighbour is not in him.

Secondly. The justice of God contriving the evil of punishment for this sin; ver. 3, "Therefore thus saith the Lord," the righteous God that judgeth between man and man, and is an avenger on them that do wrong, "Behold against this family do I devise an evil;" that is, against the whole kingdom, the house of Israel, and particularly those families in it that were cruel and oppressive. They unjustly devise evil against their brethren, and God will justly devise evil against them. Infinite Wisdom will so contrive the punishment of their sin as that it shall be very sure, and such as cannot be avoided; very severe, and such as they cannot bear; and very signal and remarkable, and such as shall be universally observed to answer the sin. The more there appears of a wicked wit in the sin, the more there shall appear of a holy wisdom and conduct in the punishment; for the Lord will be known by the judgments he executeth, he will be owned by them.

1. He finds them very secure and confident that they shall some way or other escape the judgment; or, though they fall under it, shall soon throw it off and get clear of it, and therefore he tells them, it is "an evil from which they shall not remove their neck." They were children of Belial, that would not endure the easy yoke of God's righteous commands, but broke those bonds asunder, and cast away those cords from them; and, therefore, God will lay upon them the heavy yoke of his righteous judgments, and they shall not be able to withdraw their necks from that. Those that will not be overruled shall be overcome.

2. He finds them very proud and stately; and therefore he tells them, they shall not go haughtily, with "stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go," Isa. iii. 16; for this time is evil, and the events of it were very humbling and mortifying, and such as will bring down the stoutest spirit.

3. He found them very merry and jovial; and therefore tells them their note shall be changed, their laughter shall be turned into mourning, and their joy into heaviness; ver. 4, "In that day," when God comes to punish you for your oppression, "shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation," with 'a lamentation of lamentations,' so the word is, a most lamentable lamentation, as a song of songs is a most pleasant song. Their enemies shall insult over them, and make a jest of their griefs, for they shall "take up a parable" against them. Their friends shall mourn over them, and lay to heart their calamities, and this shall be the general cry, "We be utterly spoiled," we are all undone. Note, They that were most haughty and secure in their prosperity are commonly most dejected and most ready to despair in their adversity.

4. He found them very rich in houses and lands, which they had gained by oppression, and therefore tells them they shall be stripped of all. 1st. They should in their despair give it all up; they shall say, "We be utterly spoiled, he hath changed the portion of my people," so that it is now no longer theirs, but it is in the possession and occupation of their enemies; "How hath he removed it from me!" how suddenly, how powerfully. What is unjustly got by us will not long continue with us; the righteous God will remove it. "Turning away" from us in wrath, he "hath divided our fields," and given them into the hands of strangers. Woe to those from whom God turns away. The margin reads it, 'Instead of restoring, he hath divided our fields;' instead of putting us again in possession of our estates, he hath confirmed those in the possession of them that have taken them from us. Note, It is just with God that those who have dealt fraudulently and violently with others should themselves be dealt fraudulently and violently with. 2nd. God shall ratify what they say in their despair, ver. 5; so it shall be, "Thou shalt have none to cast a cord by lot, in the congregation of the Lord;" none to divide inheritances, because there shall be no inheritances to divide, no courts to try titles to lands, or determine controversies about them, or cast lots upon them, as in Joshua's time, for all shall be in the enemies' hand. This land which should be taken from them they had not only an unquestionable title to, but a very comfortable enjoyment of; for it was "in the congregation of the Lord," or rather, the congregation of the Lord was in it. It was God's land, it was a holy land, and therefore it was the more grievous to them to be turned out of it. Note, Those are to be held the sorest calamities which cut us off from the congregation of the Lord, or cut us short in the enjoyment of the privileges of it.

6 Prophesy ye not, say they to them that prophesy:
They shall not prophesy to them,
That they shall not take shame.
7 O thou that art named the house of Jacob, [doings?
Is the spirit of the LORD straitened? are these his
Do not my words do good to him that walketh uprightly?
8 Even of late my people is risen up as an enemy:
Ye pull off the robe with the garment
From them that pass by securely as men averse from war.
9 The women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses;
From their children have ye taken away my glory for ever.
10 Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest:
Because it is polluted, it shall destroy you,
Even with a sore destruction.
11 If a man walking in the spirit and falsehood do lie,
Saying, I will prophesy unto thee of wine and of strong
He shall even be the prophet of this people. [drink;

Here are two sins charged upon the people of Israel, and judgments denounced against them for each, such judgments as exactly answer the sin—persecuting God's prophets, and oppressing God's poor.

First. Persecuting God's prophets, suppressing and silencing them, is a sin that provokes God as much as any other, for it not only spits in the face of his authority over us, but spurns at the bowels of his mercy to us; for his sending prophets to us is a sure and valuable token of his goodwill. Now observe here,

1. What the obstruction and oppression was which this people gave to God's prophets. They said to them that prophesy, Prophesy ye not, as Isa. xxx. 10. They "said to the seers, See not;" do not trouble us with accounts of what you have seen, nor bring us any such frightful messages; either they must not prophesy at all or only what they please. The word for prophesying here signifies 'dropping,' for the words of the prophets dropped from heaven as the dew. Note, Those that hate to be reformed hate to be reproved, and do all they can to silence faithful ministers. Amos was forbidden to prophesy, Am. vii. 10, &c. And therefore persecutors stop their breath, because they have no other way to stop their mouths; for if they live they will preach, and torment them that dwell on the earth, as the two witnesses did, Rev. xi. 10. Some read it, 'Prophesy not, let these prophesy:' let not those prophesy that tell us of our faults, and threaten us, but let these prophesy that will flatter us in our sins, and cry peace to us. They will not say they will have no ministers at all, but they will have such as would say just what they would have them, and go their way. This they are charged with, ver. 11, that when they silenced and frowned upon the true prophets they countenanced and encouraged pretenders, and set them up, and made an interest for them to confront God's faithful prophets. "If a man walk in the spirit of falsehood," pretend to have the Spirit of God, but really it is a spirit of error, a spirit of delusion, and he himself knows it, that he has no commission, no instruction from God, yet if he saith, "I will prophesy unto thee of wine and strong drink," if he will but assure them that they shall have wine and strong drink enough, that they need not fear the judgments of war and famine, which the other prophets threatened them with, that they should always have plenty of the delights of sense, and never know the want of them, and if he will but tell them that it is lawful for them to drink as much as they please of their wine and strong drink, and they need not scruple being drunk, that they shall have peace, though they go on and add drunkenness to thirst—such a prophet as this is a man after their own heart, that will tell them there is neither sin nor danger in that wicked course of life they lead; "He shall even be the prophet of this people," that is, such a man they would have to be their prophet, that will not only associate himself with them in their rioting and revellings, but will pretend to consecrate it by his prophecies, and so harden them in their security and sensuality. Note, It is not strange if people that are vicious and debauched covet to have ministers that are altogether such as themselves, for they are willing to believe God is so too, Ps. l. 21. But how are sacred things profaned, when they are prostituted to such base purposes, when prophecy itself shall be pressed into the services of a lewd and profane crew! But thus that servant who said, "My lord delays his coming," by the spirit of falsehood, "smote his fellow servants, and ate and drank with the drunken."

2. How they are here expostulated with upon this matter; ver. 7, "O thou that art named the house of Jacob," doth it become thee to say and do thus? Wilt thou silence them that prophesy, and forbid them to speak in God's name? Note, It is an honour and privilege to be named of the house of Jacob; "Thou art called a Jew," Rom. ii. 17. But when those who are called by that worthy name degenerate, they commonly prove the worst of men themselves, and the worst enemies to God's prophets. The Jews, that were named of the house of Jacob, were the most violent persecutors of the first preachers of the Gospel. Upon this the prophet here argues with these opposers of the word of God, and shews them, 1st. What an affront they hereby put upon God, the God of the holy prophets; "Is the spirit of the Lord straitened?" In silencing the Lord's prophets, you do what you can to silence his Spirit too; but do you think you can do it? Can you make the Spirit of God your prisoner and your servant? Will you prescribe to him what he shall say, and forbid him to say what is displeasing to you? If you silence the prophets, yet cannot the Spirit of the Lord find out other ways to reach your consciences? Can your unbelief frustrate the Divine counsels? 2nd. What a scandal it was to their profession as Jews; You are "named the house of Jacob," and it is your honour, but "are these his doings?" Are these the doings of your father Jacob? Do you herein tread in his steps? No, if you were indeed his children, you would do his works; but now ye seek to kill and silence a man that tells you the truth in God's name. "This did not Abraham," Jno. viii. 39, 40; this did not Jacob. Or, 'are these God's doings?' are these doings that will please him? are these the doings of his people? No, you know they are not; however some may be so strangely blinded and bigoted as to kill God's ministers, and think that therein they do him service, Jno. xvi. 2. 3rd. Let them consider how unreasonable and absurd the thing was in itself; "Do not my words do good to them that walk uprightly?" Yes, certainly they do. It is an appeal to the experiences of the generation of the upright: Call now if there be any of them that will answer you, and to which of the saints will you turn? Turn to which you will and you will find they all agree in this, that the word of God "doth good to them that walk uprightly;" and will you then oppose that which doth good, so much good as good preaching doth? Herein you wrong God, who owns the words of the prophets to be his words, They are my words, and who by them aims and designs to do good to mankind, Ps. cxix. 68. And will you hinder the great Benefactor from doing good? will you put the Light of the World under a bushel? You had as good say to the sun, Shine not, as "say to the seers, See not." Herein you wrong the souls of men, and deprive them of the benefit designed them by the word of God. Note, Those are enemies not only to God, but to the world, they are enemies to their country, that silence good ministers, and obstruct the means of knowledge and grace; for it is certainly for the public common good of states and kingdoms that religion should be encouraged. God's words do good to them that walk uprightly: it is the character of good people that they walk uprightly, Ps. xv. 2, and it is their comfort that the words of God are good, and do good to them; they find comfort in them. God's words are good words to good people, and speak comfortably to them. But they that opposed the words of God, and prohibited the prophets, pleaded in justification of themselves, that God's words were unprofitable and unpleasant to them, and did them no good, nor prophesied any good concerning them, but evil, as Ahab complained of Micaiah. In answer to which the prophet here tells them, that it was their own fault; they might thank themselves. They might find it of good use to them, if they were but disposed to make a good use of it; if they would but walk uprightly as they should, and so qualify themselves for comfort, the word of God would speak comfortably to them. "Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same."

3. What they are threatened with for this sin. God also will choose their delusions; and, 1st. They shall be deprived of the benefit of a faithful ministry. Since they say, Prophesy not, God will take them at their word, and "they shall not prophesy to them;" their sin shall be their punishment. If men will silence God's ministers, it is just with God to silence them, as he did Ezekiel, and to say, They shall no more be reprovers and moniters to them. Let the physician no longer attend the patient that will not be healed, for he will not be ruled. They shall not prophesy to them, and then they will not take shame. As it is the work of magistrates, so also of ministers, to put men to shame when they do amiss, Jud. xviii. 7, that, being made ashamed of their folly, they may not return again to it; but when God gives men up to be impudent and shameless in sin, he saith to his prophets, They are "joined to idols, let them alone." 2nd. They shall be given up to the blind conduct of an unfaithful ministry. We may understand ver. 11 as a threatening: if a man be found walking in the spirit of falsehood, having such a lying spirit as was in the mouth of Ahab's prophets, that will strengthen their hands in their wicked ways, "he shall be the prophet of this people;" that is, God will leave them to themselves to hearken to such. Since they will deceive, let them be deceived; since they will not admit the truth in the love of it, God will send them "strong delusions to believe a lie," 2 Thes. ii. 10, 11. They shall have prophets that will prophesy to them for wine and strong drink, so some read it; that will give you a cast of their office to your mind, for a bottle of wine, or a flagon of ale; will soothe sinners up in their sins, if they will but feed them with the gratifications of their lusts. To have such prophets, and to be ridden by them, is as sad a judgment as any people can be under, and as ill a presage of ruin approaching as it is to a particular person to be under the influence of a debauched conscience.

Secondly. Oppressing God's poor is another sin they are charged with, as before, ver. 1, 2, for it is a sin doubly hateful and provoking to God. Observe,

1. How the sin is described, ver. 8, 9; when they contemned God's prophets and opposed them, they broke out into all other wickedness. What bonds will hold those that have no reverence to God's word? They who formerly rose up against the enemies of the nation, in defence of their country, and therein behaved themselves bravely, now of late rose up as enemies of the nation, and instead of defending it destroyed it, and did it more mischief, as usually such vipers in the bowels of a state do, than a foreign enemy could do. They made a prey of men, women, and children. 1st. Of men that were travelling on the way, that "pass by securely, as men averse from war," that were far from any ill designs, but went peaceably about their lawful occasions. Those they set upon, as if they had been dangerous, obnoxious people, and "pulled off the robe with the garment from them;" that is, they stripped them both of the upper and inner garment, took away their cloak, and would have their coat also; thus barbarously did they use those that were quiet in the land: being harmless, they were fearless, and so the more easily made a prey of. 2nd. Of women, whose sex should have been their protection; ver. 9, "The women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses." "They devour widows' houses," Mat. xxiii. 14, and so turn them out of the possession of them, because they were pleasant houses, and such as they had a mind of. It was inhuman to deal thus barbarously with women, but that which especially aggravated it was, that they were the women of God's people, whom they knew to be under his protection. 3rd. Of children, whose age entitles them to a tender usage; "From their children have ye taken away my glory for ever." It was the glory of the Israelites' children that they were free, but they enslaved them; that they were born in God's house, and had a right to the privileges of it, but they sold them to strangers, sent them unto idolatrous countries, where they were deprived for ever of that glory,—at least the oppressors designed their captivity should be perpetual. Note, The righteous God will certainly reckon for injuries done to the widows and fatherless, who, being helpless and friendless, cannot otherwise expect to be righted.

2. What the sentence is that is passed upon them for it; ver. 11, "Arise ye and depart," prepare to quit this land, for you shall be forced out of it, as you have forced the women and children of my people out of their possessions; it is not, it shall not be, your rest, as it was intended Canaan should be, Ps. xcv. 11. You shall neither have contentment nor continuance in it, because it is polluted by your wickedness. Sin is defiling to a land, and sinners cannot expect to rest in a land which they have polluted, but it will spew them out, as this land spewed out the Canaanites of old, when they had polluted it with their abominations, Lev. xviii. 27, 28. Nay, you shall not only be obliged to depart out of this land, but "it shall destroy you even with a sore destruction;" you shall either be turned out of it, or, which is all one, you shall be ruined in it. We may apply this to our state in this present world; it is polluted, there is a great deal of corruption in the world through lust, and therefore we should arise and depart out of it, keep at a distance from the corruption that is in it, and keep ourselves unspotted from it; it is not our rest, it was never intended to be so, it was designed for our passage, but not for our portion, our inn, but not our home. Here we have no continuing city, let us therefore arise and depart, let us sit loose to it, and live above it, and think of leaving it, and seek a continual city above.

12 I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee;
I will surely gather the remnant of Israel;
I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah,
As the flock in the midst of their fold:
They shall make great noise by reason of the multitude
13 The breaker is come up before them: [of men.
They have broken up, and have passed through the gate,
And are gone out by it:
And their king shall pass before them,
And the LORD on the head of them.

After threatenings of wrath, the chapter here concludes, as is usual in the prophets, with promises of mercy, which were in part fulfilled when the Jews returned out of Babylon, and had their full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah. Their grievances shall be all redressed.

First. Whereas they were dispersed, they shall be brought together again, and shall jointly receive the tokens of God's favour to them, and shall have communion with each other, and comfort in each other; ver. 12, "I will assuredly assemble, O Jacob, all of thee," all that belong to thee, all that are "named of the house of Jacob," ver. 7, that are now expelled your country, ver. 10. I will bring you together again, and not one of you shall be lost, not one of you shall be missing. "I will surely gather the remnant of Israel," that remnant that is designed and reserved for salvation; they shall be brought to incorporate in one body, "I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah." Sheep are inoffensive and sociable creatures; they shall be "as the flock in the midst of their fold," their own fold, where they are safe under the shepherd's eye and care; and "they shall make great noise," as numerous flocks and herds do, with their bleating and lowing, "by reason of the multitude of men," (for the sheep are men, as the prophet explains this comparison, Eze. xxxiv. 31;) not by reason of their strifes and contentions, but by reason of their great numbers. This was accomplished when Christ by his Gospel gathered together in one "all the children of God that were scattered abroad," and united both Jews and Gentiles in one fold, and under one Shepherd; when all the complaint was that the "place was too strait" for them, that was "the noise, by reason of the multitude," Isa. xlix. 19, 20; when there were some added to the church from all parts of the world, and all men were drawn to Christ by the attractive power of his cross, which shall be done yet more and more, and perfectly done, when he shall send forth his angels to "gather in his elect from the four winds."

Secondly. Whereas God had seemed to desert them, and cast them off, now he will own them, and head them, and help them through all the difficulties that are in the way of their return and deliverance; ver. 13, "The breaker is come up before them," to break down all opposition, and clear the road for them; and under his conduct "they have broken up, and have passed through the gate," the door of escape out of their captivity, and are gone out by it with courage and resolution, having Omnipotence for their vanguard. Their King shall pass before them, to lead them in the way, even Jehovah, (he is their King,) on the head of them, as he was on the head of the armies of Israel, when they followed the pillar of cloud and fire through the wilderness, and when he appeared to Joshua, as captain of the Lord's host. Christ is the church's king; he is Jehovah, he heads them, passeth before them, brings them out of the land of their captivity, brings them into the land of their rest. He is the breaker that broke in upon the powers of darkness, and broke through them; that rent the veil, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. The learned Bishop Pearson applies it to the resurrection of Christ, by which he obtained the power, and became the pattern, of our resurrection. The breaker is gone before us out of the grave, and has carried away its gates, as Samson did Gaza's, bar and all, and by that breach we go out. The learned Dr. Pocock mentions it, as the sense which some of the ancient Jews gave of it, that the breaker is Elias, and their king the Messiah, the Son of David; and he thinks we may justly apply it to Christ and his forerunner John the Baptist. John was the breaker, he broke the ice, prepared the way of the Lord by the baptism of repentance; in him the Gospel began, from his time the kingdom of heaven suffered violence; and so the Christian church is introduced, with Messiah the Prince before it, on the head of it, going forth conquering and to conquer.

CHAPTER III.

What the apostle saith of another of the prophets is true of this, who was also his cotemporary—"Esaias is very bold," Rom. x. 20; so in this chapter Micah is very bold, in reproving and threatening the great men that were the ringleaders in sin; and he gives the reason, ver. 8, why he was so bold, because he had commission and instruction from God to say what he said, and was carried out in it by a higher spirit and power than his own. Magistracy and ministry are two great ordinances of God, for good to his church; but these were both corrupted, and the intentions of them perverted; and upon those that abused them, and so abused the church with them, the prophet is very severe, and justly so. I. He gives them their lesson severally, reproving and threatening oppressing princes, ver. 1—4; and false and flattering prophets, ver. 5—7. II. He gives them their lesson jointly, putting them together, as acting in conjunction for the ruin of the kingdom, which they should see the ruin of, ver. 9—12.

AND I said, Hear, I pray you, O heads of Jacob,
And ye princes of the house of Israel;
Is it not for you to know judgment?
2 Who hate the good, and love the evil;
Who pluck off their skin from off them,
And their flesh from off their bones;
3 Who also eat the flesh of my people,
And flay their skin from off them;
And they break their bones,
And chop them in pieces, as for the pot,
And as flesh within the caldron. [them:
4 Then shall they cry unto the LORD, but he will not hear
He will even hide his face from them at that time,
As they have behaved themselves ill in their doings.
5 Thus saith the LORD
Concerning the prophets that make my people err,
That bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace;
And he that putteth not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him.
6 Therefore night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision;
And it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divine;
And the sun shall go down over the prophets,
And the day shall be dark over them. [founded:
7 Then shall the seers be ashamed, and the diviners con-
Yea, they shall all cover their lips; for there is no answer of God.

Princes and prophets, when they faithfully discharge the duty of their office, are to be highly honoured above other men; but when they betray their trust, and act contrary to it, they should hear of their faults as well as others, and shall be made to know there is a God above them, to whom they are accountable; at this bar the prophet here in his name arraigns them,

First. Let the princes hear their charge, and their doom. The "heads of Jacob," and the "princes of the house of Israel," are called upon to hear what the prophet has to say to them, ver. 1. The word of God has reproofs for the greatest of men, which the ministers of that word ought to apply as there is occasion. The prophet here has comfort in the reflection upon it, that, whatever the success was, he had faithfully discharged his trust, "And I said, Hear, O princes." He had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had not baulked his duty for fear of the face of men. He tells them,

1. What was expected from them. "Is it not for you to know judgment?" that is, to do judgment, for otherwise the knowledge of it is of no avail. Is it not your business to administer justice impartially, and not to know faces, (as the Hebrew phrase is for partiality, and respect of persons,) but to "know judgment," and the merits of every cause? Or, it may be taken for granted that the heads and rulers are well acquainted with the rules of justice, whatever others are; for they have these means of knowledge, and have not those excuses for ignorance which some others have that are poor and foolish, Jer. v. 4; and if so, their transgression of the laws of justice is the more provoking to God, for they sin against knowledge. Is it not for you to know judgment? Yes, it is; therefore stand still, and hear your own judgment, and judge if it be not right, whether any thing can be objected against it.

2. How wretchedly they had transgressed the rules of judgment, though they knew what they were. Their principle and disposition are bad, they hate the good and love the evil; they hate good in others, and hate it should have any influence on themselves; they hate to do good, hate to have any good done, and hate those that are good and do good; and they love the evil, delight in mischief, and in those that do mischief. This being their principle, their practice was accordingly; they are very cruel and severe towards those that are under their power, and whoever lies at their mercy will find that they have none. They barbarously devour those whom they should protect, and, as unfaithful shepherds, fleece the flock they should feed; nay, instead of feeding it, they feed upon it, Eze. xxxiv. 2. It is fit indeed that he who feedeth a flock should "eat of the milk of the flock," 1 Cor. ix. 7; but that will not content them, they "eat the flesh of my people;" it is fit they should be clothed with the wool, but that will not serve, they "flay the skin from off them," ver. 3, by imposing heavier taxes upon them than they could bear, and exacting them with rigour, by mulcts and fines, and corporal punishments for pretended crimes. They ruined the estates and families of their subjects; took away from some their lives, from others their livelihoods, and were to their subjects as beasts of prey rather than shepherds; they break their bones to come at the marrow, and chop the flesh in pieces as for the pot. This speaks them, 1st. Very ravenous and greedy for themselves, indulging themselves in luxury and sensuality. 2nd. Very barbarous and cruel to those that were under them, not caring whom they beggared, so they could but enrich themselves: such evil is the love of money the root of. 3rd. How they might expect that God should deal with them, who had been thus cruel to his subjects. The rule is fixed, they shall have judgment without mercy that have shewed no mercy; ver. 4, "They shall cry to the Lord, but he will not hear them" in the day of their distress, as the poor cried to them in the day of their prosperity and they would not hear them. There will come a time when the most proud and scornful sinners will "cry to the Lord," and sue for that mercy which, when time was, they neither valued nor copied out; but it will then be in vain. God will even hide his face from them at that time, that time when they need his favour, and see themselves undone without it. At another time they would have turned their back upon him; but at that time he will turn his back upon them, as they have "behaved themselves ill in their doings." Note, Men cannot expect to do ill and fare well, but may expect to find, as Adonibezek did, that done to them which they did to others; for "he is righteous who taketh vengeance. With the froward God will shew himself froward;" and he often gives up cruel and unmerciful men into the hands of those who are cruel and unmerciful to them, as themselves have formerly been to others. This agrees with Pr. xxi. 13, "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he shall cry himself, and shall not be heard;" but the merciful have reason to hope that they shall obtain mercy.

Secondly. Let the prophets hear their charge too, and their doom; they were such as prophesied falsely, and the princes bare rule by their means. Observe,

1. What was their sin. 1st. They made it all their business to flatter and deceive the people; They make my people err, lead them into mistakes, both concerning what they should do and concerning what God would do with them. It is ill with a people when their leaders cause them to err, and those draw them out of the way that should guide them, and go before them in it. They make them to err by crying peace, by telling them that they do well, and that all shall be well with them, whereas they are in the paths of sin, and within a step of ruin. They cry "peace," but they "bite with their teeth," which perhaps is meant of their biting their own lips, as we use to do when we would suppress something which we are ready to speak; when they cried peace their own hearts gave them the lie, and they were just ready to eat their own words, and to contradict themselves; but they bit with their teeth, and kept it in. They were not blind leaders of the blind, for they saw the ditch before them, and yet led their followers into it. 2nd. They made it all their aim to glut themselves, and serve their own belly, as the seducers in St. Paul's time, Rom. xvi. 18; for their god is their belly, Phil. iii. 19. They "bite with their teeth and cry peace," that is, they will flatter and compliment those that will feed them with good bits, will give them something to eat; but as for those that "put not into their mouths," that are not continually cramming them, they look upon them as their enemies; to them they do not cry peace, as they do to those whom they look upon as their benefactors, but they "even prepare war against them;" against them they denounce the judgments of God. They preach either comfort or terror to men, not according as they are to God but as they are to them; as the crafty priests of the church of Rome, in some places, make their image either to smile or frown upon the offerer, according as his offering is. Justly is it insisted on as a necessary qualification of a minister, 1 Tim. iii. 3, and again Tit. i. 7, that he be not greedy of filthy lucre.

2. What is the sentence passed upon them for this sin, ver. 6, 7. It is threatened, 1st. That they shall be involved in troubles and miseries with those to whom they had cried peace. "Night shall be upon them," a dark, cold night of calamity, such as they flattered people with hope should never come. "It shall be dark unto you," darker to you than others; "The sun shall go down over the prophets," shall go down at noon, all comfort shall depart from them, and they shall be deprived of all hope of it; the "day shall be dark over them" in which they promised themselves light. Nor shall they only be surrounded with outward troubles, but their minds shall be full of confusion, and they shall be brought to their wits' end; their heads shall be muddied and clouded, and their own thoughts shall trouble them, and that is trouble enough. They kept others in the dark, and now God will bring them into the dark. 2nd. That thereby they shall be silenced, and all their pretensions to prophesy for ever shamed. They never had any true vision, and now, the event disproving their predictions of peace, it shall be made to appear that they never had any; that there never was an answer of God to them, but it was all a sham, and they were cheats and impostors. Their reputation being thus quite sunk, their confidence would of course fail them. And their spirits being ruffled and confused their invention would fail them too; and by reason of this darkness, both without and within too, they shall not divine, they shall not have so much as a counterfeit vision to produce, they shall be ashamed and confounded, and "cover their lips," as men that are quite baffled, and have nothing to say for themselves. Note, Those who deceive others are but preparing confusion for their own faces.

8 But truly I am full of power by the spirit of the LORD,
And of judgment, and of might,
To declare unto Jacob his transgression,
And to Israel his sin.
9 Hear this, I pray you, ye heads of the house of Jacob,
And princes of the house of Israel,
That abhor judgment, and pervert all equity.

ROMAN SOLDIERS PASSING THE PLOUGH OVER A RUINED CITY.—ver. 1.

10 They build up Zion with blood,
And Jerusalem with iniquity.
11 The heads thereof judge for reward,
And the priests thereof teach for hire,
And the prophets thereof divine for money:
Yet will they lean upon the LORD, and say,
Is not the LORD among us? none evil can come upon us.
12 Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field,
And Jerusalem shall become heaps,
And the mountain of the house as the high places of the [forest.

Here, First. The prophet experienceth a Divine power going along with him in his work, and he makes a solemn profession and protestation of it, as that which would justify him and bear him out, in his plain dealing with the princes and rulers. He would not, he durst not, make thus bold with the great men, but that he was carried out to do it by a prophetical impulse and impression. It was not he that said it, but God by him, and he could not but speak the word that God put into his mouth. It comes in likewise by way of opposition to the false prophets, who were full of shame when they lived to see themselves proved liars, and who never had courage to deal faithfully with the people, but flattered them in their sins. They were sensual, not having the Spirit; but truly, saith Micah, "I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord," ver. 8. Having in himself an assurance of the truth of what he said, he said it with assurance. Compare him with those false prophets, and you will say there is no comparison between them. "What is the chaff to the wheat?" Jer. xxiii. 28. What is painted fire to real fire? Observe here,

1. What the qualifications were with which this prophet was endued. He was "full of power, and of judgment, and of might." He had an ardent love to God, and to the souls of men, a deep concern for his glory and their salvation, and a flaming zeal against sin. He had likewise courage to reprove it, and witness against it, not fearing the wrath either of great men or of great multitudes; whatever difficulties or discouragements he met with they did not deter him, or drive him from his work, none of these things moved him; and all this was guided by judgment and discretion. He was a man of conduct as well as courage; in all his preaching there was light as well as heat, and a spirit of wisdom as well as zeal. Thus was this man of God thoroughly furnished for every good word he had to say, and every good work he had to do. And those he preached to could not but perceive him full both of power and judgment, for they found both their understandings opened and their hearts made to burn within them; with such evidence and demonstration, and such power, did the word come from him.

2. Whence he had these qualifications. Not from and of himself, but he was "full of power by the Spirit of the Lord." Knowing that it was indeed the Spirit of the Lord that was in him, and spoke by him, that it was a Divine revelation that he delivered, he spoke it boldly, and as one having authority; "set his face as a flint," knowing he should be justified and borne out in what he said, Isa. l. 7, 8. Note, Those that act honestly may act boldly; and those that are sure they have a commission from God need not be afraid of opposition from men. Nay, he had not only a Spirit of prophecy, which was the ground of his boldness, but the Spirit of sanctification endued him with that boldness and wisdom which was requisite for him. It was not in any strength of his own that he was strong, for "who is sufficient for these things?" but in the Lord, and in the power of his might, for from him all our sufficiency is. Are we full of power at any time for that which is good, it is purely by the Spirit of the Lord, for of ourselves we are weak as water; it is the God of Israel that gives strength and power both to his people and to his ministers.

3. What use he made of these qualifications, this judgment, and this power. He "declared unto Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin." If transgression be found in Jacob and Israel they must be told of it, and it is the business of God's prophets to tell them of it; to cry aloud and not to spare, Isa. lviii. 1. Those that come to hear the word of God must be willing to be told of their faults, and must not only give their ministers leave to deal plainly and faithfully with them, but take it kindly and be thankful; but because few have meekness enough to receive reproof, those have need of a great deal of boldness that are to give reproofs, and must pray for a spirit both of wisdom and might.

Secondly. The prophet exerts this power in dealing with the "heads of the house of Jacob," both the princes and the prophets, whom he had drawn up a high charge against in the former part of the chapter. He repeats the summons of their attendance and attention, ver. 9, the same that we had ver. 1, directing himself to "the princes of the house of Israel," yet he means those of Judah; for it appears, Jer. xxvi. 18, 19, (where ver. 12 is quoted,) that this was spoken in Hezekiah's kingdom; but, the ten tribes being gone into captivity, Judah is all that is now left of Jacob and Israel. The prophet speaks respectfully to them, "Hear, I pray you," and gives them their titles of heads and princes. Ministers must be faithful to great men, in reproving them for their sins, but they must not be rude and uncivil to them. Now observe here,

1. The great wickedness that these heads of the house of Jacob were guilty of, princes, priests, and prophets; in short, they were covetous, and prostituted their offices to their love of money. 1st. The princes abhorred all judgment. They would not be governed by any of its laws, either in their own practice or in passing sentence upon appeals made to them; "They perverted all equity," and scorned to be under the direction or correction of justice, when it could not be made pliable to their secular interests. When, under pretence of doing right, they did the most palpable wrong, then they perverted equity, and made it serve a purpose contrary to the intention of the founder of magistracy and fountain of power. It is laid to their charge, ver. 10, that "they build up Zion with blood." They pretend, in justification of their extortion and oppressions, that they build up Zion and Jerusalem, they add new streets and squares to the holy cities, and adorn them; they establish and advance the public interests both in church and state, and think therein they do God and Israel good service. But it is with blood and with iniquity, and therefore it cannot prosper; nor will their intentions of good to the city of God justify their contradictions to the law of God. They mistake that think a burning flaming zeal for holy church, and the propagating of the faith, will serve to consecrate robberies and murders, massacres and depredations. No; Zion's walls owe those no thanks that build them up with blood and iniquity. The sin of man worketh not the righteousness of God. The office of the princes is to judge upon appeals made to them, but they judge for reward, ver. 11. They give judgment on their side that give the bribe. The most righteous cause shall not be carried without a fee, and for a fee the most unrighteous cause shall be carried. Miserable is the people's case when the judge's inquiry upon a cause is, not What is to be done in it? but What is to be got by it? 2nd. The priests' work was to teach the people, and for that the law had provided them a very honourable, comfortable maintenance, but that will not content them; they teach for hire over and above, and will be hired to teach any thing as an oracle of God which they know will please and gain them an interest. 3rd. The prophets, it should seem, had honorary fees given them, by way of gratuity, 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8. But these prophets govern themselves in their prophesying by the prospect of temporal advantage, and that was the main thing they had in their eye. They divine for money, their tongues were mercenary, they would either prophesy or let it alone, according as they found was most for their advantage; and a man might have what oracle he would from them, if he would but pay them for it: the fit successors of Balaam, who "loved the wages of unrighteousness." Note, Though that which is wicked can never be consecrated by a zeal for the church, yet that which is sacred may be, and often is, desecrated by the love of the world. When men do that which in itself is good, but do it not but for filthy lucre, it loses its excellency, and becomes an abomination to God and man.

2. Their vain presumption and carnal confidence, notwithstanding; "They lean upon the Lord," and because they are in profession his people, they think there is neither harm nor danger in these wicked practices of theirs. Faith builds upon the Lord, rests in him, and relies upon him as the soul's foundation. Presumption only leans upon the Lord as a prop, makes use of him to serve a turn, while still the world is the foundation that is built upon. They speak with a great deal of confidence, 1st. Of their honour. "Is not the Lord among us?" have we not the tokens of his presence with us, his temple, his ark, his lively oracles? They are "haughty because of the holy mountain," and the dignities of that, Zeph. iii. 11, as if their church privileges would palliate the worst of practices; or as if God's presence with them were intended to make the priests and people rich with the sale of their performances. It was true that the Lord was among them by his ordinances, and this puffed them up with pride; but if they imagined that he was among them by his favour and love, they were mistaken. But it is a cheat the children of men often put upon themselves, to think they have God with them, when they have by their sin provoked him to depart from them. 2nd. They are confident of their own safety; No evil can come upon us. Many are rocked asleep in a fatal security by their church privileges, as if those would protect them in sin and shelter them from punishment, which are really, and will be, the greatest aggravations both of their sin and of their punishment. If men's having the Lord among them will not restrain them from doing evil, it can never secure them from suffering evil for so doing; and it is very absurd for sinners to think that their impudence will be their impunity.

3. The doom passed upon them for their real wickedness, notwithstanding their imaginary protection; ver. 12, "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field." This is that passage which is quoted as a bold word spoken by Micah, Jer. xxvi. 18, which yet Hezekiah and his princes took well, though in another reign it might have gone near to cost him his head; nay, they repented and reformed, and so the execution of this threatening was prevented and did not come in those days. 1st. It is the ruin of holy places that is here foretold, places that had been highly honoured with the tokens of God's presence and the performances of his worship. It is Zion that shall be ploughed as a field, the building burnt to the ground and levelled with it. Some observe that this was literally fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, when the ground was ploughed upon which the city stood, in token of its utter dissolution, and that no city should be built upon that ground without the emperor's leave. Even Jerusalem, the holy city, shall become heaps of ruins, and the mountain of the house, on which the temple is built, shall be overgrown with briars and thorns, as the high places of the forest. If sacred places be polluted by sin they must expect to be wasted and ruined by the judgments of God. 2nd. It is the wickedness of those who preside in them that brings the ruin. It is for your sake that "Zion shall be ploughed as a field;" you pretend to build up Zion, but doing it by blood and iniquity, you pull it down. Note, The sin of priests and princes is often the ruin of states and churches. Delirant reges, plectuntur achivi,—'The kings act foolishly, and the people suffer for it.'

CHAPTER IV.

Comparing this chapter with the close of the foregoing chapter, the comfortable promises here with the terrible threatenings there, we may with the apostle "behold the goodness and severity of God," Rom. xi. 22; towards the Jewish church, which fell, severity, when Zion was ploughed as a field; but towards the Christian church, which was built upon the ruins of it, goodness, great goodness; for it is here promised, I. That it shall be advanced and enlarged by the accession of the nations to it, ver. 1, 2. II. That it shall be protected in tranquillity and peace, ver. 3, 4. III. That it shall be kept close, and constant and faithful to God, ver. 5. IV. That under Christ's government all its grievances should be redressed, ver. 6, 7. V. That it shall have an ample and flourishing dominion, ver. 8. VI. That its troubles shall be brought to a happy issue at length, ver. 9, 10. VII. That its enemies should be disquieted, nay, that they should be destroyed in and by their attempts against it, ver. 11—13.

BUT in the last days it shall come to pass,
That the mountain of the house of the LORD
Shall be established in the top of the mountains,
And it shall be exalted above the hills;
And people shall flow unto it.

2 And many nations shall come, and say,
Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD,
And to the house of the God of Jacob;
And he will teach us of his ways,
And we will walk in his paths:
For the law shall go forth of Zion,
And the word of the LORD from Jerusalem.

3 And he shall judge among many people,
And rebuke strong nations afar off;
And they shall beat their swords into plowshares,
And their spears into pruninghooks:
Nation shall not lift up a sword against nation,
Neither shall they learn war any more.

4 But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree;
And none shall make them afraid:
For the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it.

ORIENTAL VERANDAH.

5 For all people will walk every one in the name of his god,
And we will walk in the name of the LORD our God for ever and ever.

6 In that day, saith the LORD,
Will I assemble her that halteth,
And I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted;

7 And I will make her that halted a remnant,
And her that was cast far off a strong nation:
And the LORD shall reign over them in mount Zion
From henceforth, even for ever.

It is a very comfortable "but" with which this chapter begins, and very reviving to those who lay the interests of God's church near their hearts, and are concerned for the welfare of it. When we sometimes see the corruptions of the church, especially of church rulers, princes, priests, and prophets, seeking their own things, and not the things of God,—and when we soon after see the desolations of the church, Zion for their sakes ploughed as a field,—we are ready to fear it will one day perish between both, that the name of Israel shall be no more in remembrance; are ready to give up all for gone, and to conclude the church will have neither root nor branch upon earth. But let not our faith fail in this matter; out of the ashes of the church another phœnix shall arise. In the last words of the foregoing chapter we left "the mountain of the house" as desolate and waste as the "high places of the forest;" and is it possible that such a wilderness should ever become a fruitful field again? Yes; the first words of this chapter bring in the mountain of the Lord's house as much dignified by being frequented as ever it had been disgraced by being deserted. Though Zion be ploughed as a field, yet God has not cast off his people, but by the fall of the Jews salvation is come to the Gentiles, so that it proves to be the riches of the world, Rom. xi. 11, 12. This is the mystery which God by the prophet here shews us, and he saith the very same in the first three verses of this chapter which another prophet said by the word of the Lord at the same time, Isa. ii. 2—4, that "out of the mouth of those two witnesses" these promises might be established; and very precious promises they are, relating to the gospel church, which have been in part accomplished, and will be yet more and more, for he is faithful that has promised.

First. That there shall be a church for God set up in the world, after the defection and destruction of the Jewish church, and this in the last days, that is, as some of the rabbins themselves acknowledge, in the days of the Messiah. The people of God shall be incorporated by a new charter, a new spiritual way of worship shall be enacted, and a new institution of offices to attend it; better privileges shall be granted by this new charter, and better provision made for the enlarging and establishing the kingdom of God among men than had been made by the Old Testament constitution. The mountain of the house of the Lord shall again appear firm ground for God's faithful worshippers to stand, and go, and build upon, in their attendance on him, ver. 1. And it shall be a centre of unity to them; a church shall be set up in the world, to which the Lord will be daily adding such as shall be saved.

Secondly. That this church shall be firmly founded and well built. It shall be "established in the top of the mountains;" Christ himself will build it upon a rock; it shall be an impregnable fort, upon an immovable foundation, so that the gates of hell shall neither overthrow the one nor undermine the other, Mat. xvi. 18; its foundations are still in the holy mountains, Ps. lxxxvii. 1, the everlasting mountains, which cannot, which shall not, be removed. It shall be established, not as the temple, upon one mountain, but upon many; for the foundations of the church, as they are sure, so they are large.

Thirdly. That it shall be highly advanced, and become eminent and conspicuous. It shall be "exalted above the hills," observed with wonder for its growing greatness from small beginnings; the kingdom of Christ shall shine with greater lustre than ever any of the kingdoms of the earth did. It shall be as a city on a hill, which cannot be hid. Mat. v. 14. The glory of this latter house is greater than that of the former, Hag. ii. 9: see 2 Cor. iii. 7, 8, &c.

Fourthly. That there shall be a great accession of converts to it, and succession of converts in it. People shall flow unto it as the waters of a river are continually flowing; there shall be a constant stream of believers flowing in from all parts into the church, as the people of the Jews flowed into the temple, while it was standing, to worship there. Then many tribes came to the mountain of the house, to inquire of God's temple. But in gospel times many nations shall flow into the church, shall fly like a cloud, and as the doves to their windows; for ministers shall be sent forth to disciple all nations, and they shall not labour in vain, for, multitudes being wrought upon to believe the Gospel and embrace the Christian religion, they shall excite and encourage one another, and shall say, "Come, and let us go up unto the mountain of the Lord," now raised among us, even to "the house of the God of Jacob," the spiritual temple which we need not travel far to, for it is brought to our doors, and set up in the midst of us. Thus shall people be made "willing in the day of his power," Ps. cx. 3, and shall do what they can to make others willing, as Andrew invited Peter, and Philip Nathaniel, to be acquainted with Christ. They shall "call the people to the mountain," Deu. xxxiii. 19, for there is in Christ enough for all, enough for each. Now observe what it is, 1. Which those converts expect to find in "the house of the God of Jacob." They come thither for instruction; "He will teach us of his ways," what is the way in which he would have us to walk with him, and in which we may depend upon him to meet us graciously. Note, Where we come to worship God we come to be taught of him. 2. Which they engage to do when they are thus taught of God; "We will walk in his paths." Note, Those may comfortably expect that God will teach them who are firmly resolved by his grace to do as they are taught.

Fifthly. That in order to this a new revelation shall be published to the world, on which the church should be founded, and by which multitudes should be brought into it; "for the Lord shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." The Gospel is here called "the word of the Lord," for "the Lord gave the word, and great was the company of them that published it." Ps. lxviii. 11. It was of a Divine original, a Divine authority; it began to be spoken by the Lord Christ himself, Heb. ii. 3; and it is a law, a law of faith; we are under the law of Christ. This was to go forth from Jerusalem, from Zion, the metropolis of the Old Testament dispensation, where the temple, and altars, and oracles were, and whither the Jews went to worship from all parts. There the Gospel must take its rise, to shew the connexion between the Old Testament and the New; that the Gospel is not set up in opposition to the law, but is an explication and illustration of it, and a "branch growing out of its roots." It was in Jerusalem that Christ preached and wrought miracles; there he died, rose again, and ascended; there the Spirit was poured out, and those that were to preach repentance and remission of sins to all nations were ordered to begin at Jerusalem, so that thence flowed the streams that were to water the desert world.

Sixthly. That a convincing power should go along with the gospel of Christ in all places where it should be preached; ver. 3, "He shall judge among many people." Messiah the lawgiver, ver. 2, is here the judge, for to him the Father committed all judgment, and "for judgment he came into this world;" his word, the word of his Gospel, that was to go forth from Jerusalem, was the golden sceptre by which he shall rule and judge, when he sits as king on the holy hill of Zion, Ps. ii. 6. By it he shall "rebuke strong nations afar off;" for the Spirit, working with the word, shall reprove the world, Jno. xvi. 8. It is promised to the Son of David that he shall judge among the heathen, Ps. cx. 6, which he doth, when, in the chariot of his everlasting Gospel, he goes forth and goes on, conquering and to conquer.

Seventhly. That a disposition to mutual peace and love should be the happy effect of the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah. "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares;" that is, angry, passionate men, that have been fierce and furious, shall be wonderfully sweetened, and made mild and meek, Tit. iii. 2, 3. They that before their conversion did injuries, and would bear none, after their conversion can bear injuries, but will do none. As far as the Gospel prevails it makes men peaceable, for such is the wisdom from above; it is gentle, and easy to be entreated; and if nations were but leavened by it there would be an universal peace. When Christ was born there was an universal peace in the Roman empire. Those that were first brought into the gospel church were all of one heart and of one soul, Acts iv. 32; and it was observed of the primitive Christians how well they loved one another: in heaven this will have its full accomplishment. It is promised, 1. That none shall be quarrelsome. The art of war, instead of being improved, which some reckon the glory of a kingdom, shall be forgotten, and laid aside as useless; they "shall not learn war any more," as they have done, for they shall have no need to defend themselves, nor any inclination to offend their neighbours. "Nation shall no longer lift up sword against nation;" not that the Gospel will make men cowards, but it will make men peaceable. 2. That all shall be quiet, both from evil and from the fear of evil, ver. 4. They shall sit safely, and none shall disturb them; they shall sit securely, and shall not disturb themselves, every man "under his vine and under his fig-tree," enjoying the fruit of them, and needing no other shelter but the leaves of them. "None shall make them afraid;" not only there shall be nothing that is likely to frighten them, but they shall not be disposed to fear; under the dominion of Christ, as that of Solomon, there shall be abundance of peace. Though his followers have trouble in the world, in him they enjoy great tranquillity. If this seems unlikely, yet we may depend upon it, for "the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it," and no word of his shall fall to the ground; what he hath spoken by his word he will do by his providence and grace. He that is the Lord of hosts will be the God of peace; and those may well be easy whom the Lord of hosts, of all hosts, undertakes the protection of.

Eighthly. That the church shall be constant in their duty, and so shall make a good use of their tranquillity, and shall not provoke the Lord to deprive them of it, ver. 5. When the churches have rest they shall be edified, and confirmed, and comforted, and shall resolve to be as firm to their God as other nations are to theirs, though they be no gods. Where we find the foregoing promises, (Isa. ii. 2, &c.,) it follows, ver. 5, "O house of Jacob, come ye and let us walk in the light of the Lord;" and here, "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God." Note, Then peace is a blessing indeed when it strengthens our resolutions to cleave to the Lord. Observe, 1. How constant other nations were to their gods. "All people will walk every one in the name of his God," will own their God and cleave to him, will worship their God and serve him, will depend upon him and put a confidence in him. Whatever men make a god of they will make use of, and take his name along with them in all their actions and affairs. The mariners in a storm cried every man to his god, Jon. i. 5; and no instance could be found of a nation's changing their gods, Jer. ii. 11. If the hosts of heaven were their gods, they loved them, and served them, and walked after them, Jer. viii. 2. 2. How constant God's people now resolve to be to him. "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God," will acknowledge him in all our ways, and govern ourselves by a continual regard to him, doing nothing but what we have warrant from him for, and openly professing our relation to him. Observe, Their resolution is peremptory: it is not a thing that needs be disputed: "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God;" it is just and reasonable, he is our God. And it is a resolution for a perpetuity; we will do it for ever and ever, and will never leave him. He will be ours for ever, and therefore so we will be his, and never repent our choice.

Ninthly. That, notwithstanding the dispersions, distress, and infirmities of the church, it shall be formed and established, and made very considerable, ver. 6, 7. 1. The state of the church had been low, and weak, and very helpless, in the latter times of the Old Testament, partly through the corruptions of the Jewish nation, and partly through the oppressions under which they groaned. They were like a flock of sheep, that were maimed, worried, and scattered, Eze. xxxiv. 16; Jer. l. 6, 17. The good people among them, and in other places, that were well inclined, were dispersed, were very infirm, and in a manner lost, and cast far off. 2. It is promised that all these grievances shall be redressed, and the distemper healed. Christ will come himself, Mat. xv. 24, and send his apostles to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," Mat. x. 6. From among the Jews that halted, or that for want of strength could not go upright, God gathered a remnant, (ver. 7,) that "remnant according to the election of grace," which is spoken of in Rom. xi. 7, which embraced the Gospel of Christ. And from among the Gentiles that were cast far off, (so the Gentiles are described to be, Eph. ii. 13; Acts ii. 39,) he raised a strong nation, greater numbers of them were brought into the church than of the Jews, Gal. iv. 27. And such a strong nation the gospel church is, that the gates of hell shall never be able to prevail against it. The church of Christ is more numerous than any other nation, and "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might."

Tenthly. That the Messiah shall be the king of this kingdom, shall protect and govern it, and order all the affairs of it for the best, and this to the end of time. The Lord Jesus "shall reign over them in mount Zion," by his word and Spirit in his ordinances, and this "from henceforth and for ever," for "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end."

8 And thou, O tower of the flock,
The strong hold of the daughter of Zion,
Unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion;
The kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem.
9 Now why dost thou cry out aloud?
Is there no king in thee?
Is thy counsellor perished?
For pangs have taken thee as a woman in travail.
10 Be in pain, and labour to bring forth, O daughter of Zion,
Like a woman in travail:
For now shalt thou go forth out of the city,
And thou shalt dwell in the field,
And thou shalt go even to Babylon;
There shalt thou be delivered;
There the LORD shall redeem thee from the hand of thine enemies.
11 Now also many nations are gathered against thee,
That say, Let her be defiled,
And let our eye look upon Zion.
12 But they know not the thoughts of the LORD,
Neither understand they his counsel:
For he shall gather them as the sheaves into the floor.
13 Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion:
For I will make thine horn iron,
And I will make thy hoofs brass:
And thou shalt beat in pieces many people:
And I will consecrate their gain unto the LORD,
And their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth.

These verses concern Zion and Jerusalem, here called the tower of the flock, or the tower of Edar. We read of such a place Gen. xxxv. 21, near Bethlehem; and some conjecture it is the same place where the shepherds were keeping their flocks when the angels brought them tidings of the birth of Christ; and some think Bethlehem itself is here spoken of, as ch. v. 2. Some think it is a tower at that gate of Jerusalem which is called the sheep gate, Neh. iii. 32, and conjecture that through that gate Christ rode in triumph into Jerusalem. However, it seems to be put for Jerusalem itself, or for Zion the tower of David; all the sheep of Israel flocked thither three times a year. It was the "stronghold," (Ophel, which is also a name of a place in Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 27,) or castle, "of the daughter of Zion." Now here,

First. We have a promise of the glories of the spiritual Jerusalem, the gospel church, which is "the tower of the flock," that one fold in which all the sheep of Christ are protected under one Shepherd; "Unto thee shall it come," that which thou hast long waited and wished for, "even the first dominion," a dignity and power equal to that of David and Solomon, by whom Jerusalem was first raised. That kingdom shall again "come to the daughter of Jerusalem," which it was deprived of at the captivity. It shall make as great a figure, and shine with as much lustre among the nations, and have as much influence upon them, as ever it had. This is the first or chief dominion. Now this had by no means its accomplishment in Zerubbabel; his was nothing like the first dominion, either in respect of splendour and sovereignty at home or the extent of power abroad, and therefore it must refer to the kingdom of the Messiah, (and to that the Chaldee paraphrase refers it,) and had its accomplishment when God gave to our Lord Jesus "the throne of his father David," Lu. i. 32, set him king "upon the holy hill of Zion," and "gave him the heathen for his inheritance," Ps. ii. 6; made him his firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth, Ps. lxxxix. 27; Dan. vii. 14. David in spirit "called him, Lord," and, as Dr. Pocock observes, he witnessed of himself, and his witness was true, that he was greater than Solomon, none of their dominions being like his for extent and duration. The common people welcomed Christ into Jerusalem with "Hosannas to the Son of David," to shew that it was the first dominion that came to the daughter of Zion; and the evangelist applies it to the promise of Zion's King coming to her, Mat. xxi. 5; Zec. ix. 9. Some give this sense to the words, To Zion and Jerusalem, that tower of the flock, to the nation of the Jews, came the first dominion, that is, there the kingdom of Christ was first set up, the Gospel of the kingdom was first preached, Lu. xxiv. 47; there Christ was first called King of the Jews.

Secondly. This is illustrated by a prediction of the calamities of the literal Jerusalem, to which some favour and relief should be granted, as a type and figure of what God would do for the gospel Jerusalem in the last days, notwithstanding its distresses. We have here,

1. Jerusalem put in pain by the providences of God. She cries out aloud, that all her neighbours may take notice of her griefs, because there is no king in her, none of that honour and power she used to have. Instead of ruling the nations, as she did when she sat a queen, she is ruled by them, and become a captive. Her counsellors are perished; she is no longer at her own disposal, but is given up to the will of her enemies, and is governed by their counsellors. Pangs have taken her. 1st. She is carried captive to Babylon, and there is in pangs of grief. She goes forth out of the city, and is constrained to dwell in the field, exposed to all manner of inconveniences; she goes even to Babylon, and there wears out seventy tedious years in a miserable captivity, all that while in pain, "as a woman in travail," waiting to be delivered, and thinking the time very long. 2nd. When she is delivered out of Babylon, and redeemed from the hand of her enemies there, yet still she is in pangs of fear. The end of one trouble is but the beginning of another; for now also, when Jerusalem is in the rebuilding, many "nations are gathered against her," ver. 11. They were so in Ezra's and Nehemiah's time, and did all they could to obstruct the building of the temple and the wall. They were so in the time of the Maccabees; they said, Let her be defiled, let her be looked upon as a place polluted with sin, and be forsaken and abandoned both of God and man; let her holy places be profaned, and all her honours laid in the dust; let our eye look upon Zion, and please itself with the sight of its ruins, as it is said of Edom, Oba. 12, "Thou shouldest not have looked upon the day of thy brother." Let our eyes see our desire upon Zion, the day we have long wished for. When they hear the enemies thus combine against them, and insult over them, no wonder that they are in pain, and cry aloud; "Without are fightings, within are fears."

2. Jerusalem made easy by the promises of God; "Why dost thou cry aloud?" Let thy griefs and fears be silenced, indulge not thyself in them, for, though things are bad with thee, they shall end well. Thy pangs are great, but they are like those of a woman in travail, ver. 9, that labours to bring forth, ver. 10, the issue of which will be good at last. Jerusalem's pangs are not as dying agonies, but as travailing throes, which after a while will be forgotten, for joy that a child is born into the world. Let the literal Jerusalem comfort herself with this, that whatever straits she may be reduced to, she shall continue till the coming of the Messiah, for there his kingdom must be first set up; and she shall not be destroyed while that blessing is in her. And when at length she is ploughed as a field, and become heaps, as is threatened, ch. iii. 12, yet her privileges shall be resigned to the spiritual Jerusalem, and in that the promises made to her shall be fulfilled. Let Jerusalem be easy then; for, 1st. Her captivity in Babylon shall have an end, a happy end; ver. 10, "There shalt thou be delivered," and "the Lord shall redeem thee from the hand of thine enemies" there. This was done by Cyrus, who acted therein as God's servant; and that deliverance was typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ, and the release from our spiritual bondage which is proclaimed in the everlasting Gospel, that acceptable year of the Lord, in which Christ himself preached liberty to the captives, and the "opening of the prison to them that were bound." 2nd. The designs of her enemies against her afterwards shall be baffled, nay, they shall turn upon themselves, ver. 12, 13. They promise themselves a day of it, but it shall prove God's day; they are gathered against Zion to destroy it, but it shall prove to their own destruction, which Israel and his God shall have the glory of. First. Their coming together against Zion shall be the occasion of their ruin. They associate themselves, and gird themselves, that they may break Jerusalem in pieces, but it will prove that they shall be broken in pieces; Isa. viii. 9, "They know not the thoughts of the Lord." When they are gathering together, and providence favours them in it, they little think what God is designing by it, nor do they understand his counsel. They know what they aim at in coming together, but they know not what God aims at in bringing them together; they aim at Zion's ruin, but God aims at theirs. Note, When men are made use of as instruments of Providence, in accomplishing its purposes, it is very common for them to intend one thing and God intend quite the contrary. The king of Assyria is to be a rod in God's hand, for the correction of his people, in order to their reformation; "Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so," Isa. x. 7. And thus it is here; the nations are gathered against Zion, as soldiers into the field, but God gathers them as sheaves into the floor, to be beaten to pieces; and they could not have been so easily, so effectually destroyed, if they had not gathered together against Zion. Note, The designs of enemies for the ruin of the church often prove ruining to themselves, and thereby they prepare themselves for destruction, and put themselves in the way of it. They are "snared in the work of their own hands." Secondly. Zion shall have the honour of being victorious over them, ver. 13, when they are "gathered as sheaves into the floor," to be trodden down, as the corn then was by the oxen; then "Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion." Instead of fearing them, and fleeing from them, boldly set upon them, and take the opportunity Providence favours thee with of trampling upon them. Plead not thine own weakness, and that thou art not a match for so many confederated enemies; God will make thy horn iron to push them down, and thy hoofs brass to tread upon them when they are down; and thus thou shalt beat in pieces many people that have long been beating thee in pieces. Thus, when God pleaseth, "The daughter of Babylon is made a threshing-floor, it is time to thresh her," Jer. li. 33. And the worm Jacob is made a threshing instrument, with which God will "thresh the mountains, and make them as chaff," Isa. xli. 14, 15. How strangely, how happily, are the tables turned since Jacob was the threshing-floor, and Babylon the threshing instrument, Isa. xxi. 10. Note, When God has conquering work for his people to do he will furnish them with strength and ability for it,—will make the horn iron, and the hoofs brass; and when he doth so, they must exert the power he gives them, and execute the commission; even the daughter of Zion must arise and thresh. Thirdly. The glory of the victory shall redound to God. Zion shall thresh these sheaves in the floor, but the corn threshed out shall be a meat offering at God's altar; "I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord," (that is, I will have it consecrated,) and "their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth." The spoils gained by Zion's victory shall be brought into the sanctuary, and devoted to God, either in part, as those of Midian, Num. xxxi. 28, or in whole, as those of Jericho, Jos. vi. 17. God is Jehovah, the fountain of being; he is the "Lord of the whole earth," the fountain of power, and therefore needs not any of our gain or substance, but may challenge and demand it all if he pleaseth; and with ourselves we must devote all we have to his honour, to be employed as he directs. Thus far all we have must have holiness to the Lord written upon it; all our gain and substance must be "consecrated to the Lord of the whole earth," Isa. xxiii. 18. And extraordinary successes call for extraordinary acknowledgments, whether they be of spoils in war or gains in trade. It is God that gives us power to get wealth, which way soever it is honestly got, and therefore he must be honoured with what we get. Some make all this to point at the defeat of Sennacherib, when he besieged Jerusalem, others to the destruction of Babylon, others to the successes of the Maccabees; but the learned Dr. Pocock, and others, think it had its full accomplishment in the spiritual victories obtained by the Gospel of Christ over the powers of darkness that fought against it. The nations thought to have ruined Christianity in its infancy, but it was victorious over them. Those that persisted in their enmity were broken to pieces, Mat. xxi. 44, particularly the Jewish nation. But multitudes by Divine grace were gained to the church; and they and their substance were consecrated to the Lord Jesus, the Lord of the whole earth.

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter we have, I. A prediction of the troubles and distresses of the Jewish nation, ver. 1. II. A promise of the Messiah, and of his kingdom, to support the people of God in the day of these troubles. 1. Of the birth of the Messiah, ver. 2, 3; 2. Of his advancement, ver. 4; 3. Of his protection of his people, and his victory over his and their enemies, ver. 5, 6; 4. Of the great increase of the church, and the blessings that shall come to the world by it, ver. 7; 5. Of the destruction of the enemies of the church, both those without, that attack it, and those within, that expose it, ver. 8—15.

And the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof:
Thus shall he deliver us from the Assyrian,
When he cometh into our land,
And when he treadeth within our borders.

Here, as before, we have,

First. The abasement and distress of Zion, ver. 1. The Jewish nation for many years before the captivity dwindled and fell into disgrace; "Now gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops!" It is either a summons to Zion's enemies, that had troops at their service, to come and do their worst against her, (God will suffer them to do it,) or a challenge to Zion's friends, that had troops too at command, to come and do their best for her. Let them gather in troops, yet it should be to no purpose; for, saith the prophet, in the name of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, "He hath laid siege against us." The king of Assyria has, the king of Babylon has, and we know not which way to defend ourselves, so that the enemies shall gain their point, and prevail so far as "to smite the judge of Israel," the king, the chief justice, and the other inferior judges, "with a rod upon the cheek," in contempt of them and their dignity. Having made them prisoners, they shall use them as shamefully as any one of the common captives. Complaint had been made of the judges of Israel, ch. iii. 11, that they were corrupt and took bribes, and this disgrace came justly upon them for abusing their power; yet it was a great calamity to Israel to have their judges treated thus ignominiously. Some make this the reason why the troops shall lay siege to Jerusalem, that is, the Roman army, because the Jews "shall smite the judge of Israel upon the cheek," because of the indignities they shall do to the Messiah, the Judge of Israel, whom they smote on the cheek, saying, "Prophesy who smote thee!" But the former sense seems more probable, and that it is meant of the besieging of Jerusalem, not by the Romans, but by the Chaldeans; and was fulfilled in the indignities done to king Zedekiah and the princes of the house of David.

Secondly. The advancement of Zion's king. Having shewed how low the house of David should be brought, and how vilely the shield of that mighty family should be cast away, as though it had not been anointed with oil,—to encourage the faith of God's people, who might be tempted now to think that his covenant with David and his house was abrogated, according to the psalmist's complaint, Ps. lxxxix. 38, 39, he adds an illustrious prediction of the Messiah and his kingdom, in whom that covenant should be established, and the honours of that house should be revived, advanced, and perpetuated. Now let us see,

1. How the Messiah is here described. It is he that is to be "ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting," from the 'days of eternity, as the word is. Where we have,

1st. His existence from eternity as God. His goings forth or emanations, as the goings forth of the beams from the sun, were, or have been, of old, from everlasting; which, saith Dr. Pocock, is so signal a description of Christ's eternal generation, or his going forth as the Son of God, begotten of his Father before all worlds, that this prophecy must belong only to him, and could never be verified of any other. It certainly speaks of a going forth that was now past, when the prophet spoke, and cannot but be read as we read it, his outgoings have been; and the putting of both these words together, which severally are used to denote eternity, plainly shew that they must be taken in the strictest sense, the same with Ps. xc. 2, "From everlasting to everlasting thou art God," and can be applied to no other but to him who was able to say, "Before Abraham was, I am," Jno. viii. 58. Dr. Pocock observes that the 'going forth' is used, Deu. viii. 3, for a word which 'proceedeth out of the mouth,' and is therefore very fitly used to signify the eternal generation of him who is called the Word of God, that was "in the beginning with God," Jno. i. 1, 2.

2nd. His office as Mediator. He was to be ruler in Israel, king of his church; he was to "reign over the house of Jacob for ever," Lu. i. 32, 33. The Jews object that our Lord Jesus could not be the Messiah, for he was so far from being ruler in Israel, that Israel ruled over him, and put him to death, and would not have him to reign over them; but he answered that himself, when he said his "kingdom was not of this world," Jno. xviii. 36. And it is a spiritual Israel he reigns over, the children of promise, all the followers of believing Abraham and praying Jacob; in the hearts of these he reigns by his Spirit and grace, and in the society of these by his words and ordinances. And was not he ruler in Israel whom winds and seas obeyed, and legions of devils were forced to truckle to, and who commanded away diseases from the sick, and called the dead out of their graves? None but he "whose goings forth were from of old, from everlasting," was fit to be "ruler in Israel," to be a head of the church, and head over all things to the church.

2. What is here foretold concerning him.

1st. That Bethlehem should be the place of his nativity, ver. 2. This was the Scripture which the scribes went upon, when, with the greatest assurance, they told Herod "where Christ should be born," Mat. ii. 6; and from hence it was universally known among the Jews that "Christ cometh out of the town of Bethlehem where David was," Jno. vii. 42. Bethlehem signifies the house of bread, the fittest place for him to be born in who is the bread of life. And because it was the city of David, by a special providence it was ordered that he should be born there who was to be the Son of David, and his heir and successor for ever. It is called Bethlehem-Ephratah, both names of the same city, as appears, Gen. xxxv. 19. It was "little among the thousands of Judah," not considerable either for the number of the inhabitants or the figure they made; it had nothing in it worthy to have this honour put upon it. But God in that, as in other instances, chose to exalt them of low degree, Lu. i. 52. Christ would give honour to the place of his birth, and not derive honour from it. Though thou be little, yet this shall make thee great; and, as St. Matthew reads it, thou "art not the least among the princes of Judah," but upon this account art really honourable above any of them. A relation to Christ will magnify those that are little in the world.

2nd. That in the fulness of time he should be born of a woman; ver. 3, "Therefore will he give them up. He will give up his people Israel to distress and trouble, and will defer their salvation, which has been so long promised and expected, until the time, the set time, "that she which travaileth hath brought forth;" or, as it should be read, 'that she who shall bring forth shall have brought forth;' that the blessed virgin, who was to be the mother of the Messiah, shall have brought him forth at Bethlehem, the place appointed. This Dr. Pocock thinks to be the most proper, genuine sense of the words. Though the outgoings of the Messiah were from everlasting, yet the redemption in Jerusalem, the consolation of Israel, must be waited for, Lu. ii. 25—38, till the time that "she who should bring forth" (so the virgin Mary is called, as Christ is himself called, "he that should come") shall bring forth; and in the meantime he will give them up. Divine salvations must be waited for until the time fixed for the bringing of them forth.

3rd. That "the remnant of his brethren shall then return unto the children of Israel." The remnant of the Jewish nation shall return to the spirit of the true genuine children of Israel, a people in covenant with God; the hearts of the children shall be turned to the fathers, Mal. iv. 6. Some understand it of all believers, Gentiles as well as Jews; they shall all be incorporated into the commonwealth of Israel; and, as they are all brethren to one another, so "he is not ashamed to call them brethren," Heb. ii. 11.

4th. That he shall be a glorious Prince, and his subjects shall be happy under his government; ver. 4, "He shall stand and feed;" that is, he shall both teach and rule, and shall continue to do so, as a good Shepherd, with wisdom, and care, and love. So it was foretold, "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd," shall provide green pastures for them, and under-shepherds to lead them into these pastures. He is the good Shepherd that goes before the sheep, and presides among them. He shall do this, not as an ordinary man, but in the strength of the Lord, as one clothed with a Divine power to go through his work, and break through the difficulties in his way, so as not to fail or be discouraged. He shall do it "in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God;" that is, so as plainly to evidence that God's name was in him, Ex. xxiii. 21, the majesty of his name; for "he taught as one having authority, and not as the scribes." The prophets prefaced their messages with, "Thus saith the Lord;" but Christ spoke not as a servant, but as a son. "Verily, verily, I say unto you:" this was feeding "in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God. All power was given him in heaven and in earth," a "power over all flesh," by virtue of which he still rules "in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God," a name above every name. Christ's government shall be, First. Very happy for his subjects, for they shall abide. They shall be safe and easy, and continue so for ever; "because he lives, they shall live also." They shall lie down in the green pastures to which he shall lead them, "shall abide in God's tabernacle for ever," Ps. lxi. 4; his church shall abide, and he in it and with it always even to the end of the world. Secondly. It shall be very glorious to himself; "Now shall he be great to the ends of the earth." Now he stands and feeds his flock, "now shall he be great;" for Christ reckons it his greatness to do good. Now he shall be great to the ends of the earth, for the uttermost parts of the earth shall be given him for his possession, and the ends of the world shall see his salvation.

5th. That he shall secure the peace and welfare of his church and people against all the attempts of his and their enemies; ver. 5, 6, "This man," as king and ruler, "shall be the peace when the Assyrian shall come into this land." This refers to the deliverance of Hezekiah and his kingdom from the power of Sennacherib, who invaded them, in the type; but under the shadow of that is a promise of the safety of the gospel church, and of all believers, from the designs and attempts of the powers of darkness, Satan and all his instruments, the dragon and his angels, that seek to devour the church of the firstborn, and all that belong to it. Observe, First. The peril and danger which Christ's subjects are supposed to be in. The Assyrian, a potent enemy, comes into their land, ver. 5, 6, treads within their borders, nay, prevails so far as to tread in their palaces; it was a time of treading down and of perplexity when Sennacherib made a descent upon Judah, took all the defenced cities, and laid siege to Jerusalem, Isa. xxxvi. 1, xxxvii. 3: this represented the gates of hell fighting against the kingdom of Christ, compassing the camp of the saints and the holy city, and threatening to bear down all before them. When the terrors of the law set themselves in array against a convinced soul, when the temptations of Satan assault the people of God, and the troubles of the world threaten to rob them of all their comforts, then the Assyrian comes into their land, and treads in their palaces; "Without are fightings, within are fears." Secondly. The protection and defence which his subjects are then sure to be under. 1*st.* Christ will himself be their peace. When the Assyrian comes with such a force into a land, can there be any other peace than a tame submission and an unresisted desolation? Yes, even then the church's King will be the conservator of the church's peace, will be for a hiding-place, Isa. xxxii. 1, 2. Christ is our peace as a Priest, making atonement for sin and reconciling us to God; and he is our peace as a King, conquering our enemies, and commanding down disquieting fears and passions; "He creates the fruit of the lips, peace." Even when the Assyrian comes into the land, when we are in the greatest distress and danger, and have received a sentence of death within ourselves, yet "this man may be the peace." "In me," saith Christ, "you shall have peace," when "in the world you have tribulation;" at such a time our souls may dwell at ease in him. 2*nd.* He will find out proper instruments to be employed for their protection and deliverance, and the defeat of their enemies. "Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds and eight principal men;" that is, a competent number of persons proper to oppose the enemy, and make head against him, and protect the church of God in peace, men that shall have the care and tenderness of shepherds, and the courage and authority of principal men, or princes of men. Seven and eight are a certain number for an uncertain. Note, When God has work to do he will not want fitting instruments to do it with; and when he pleaseth he can do it by a few. He needs not raise thousands, but seven or eight principal men may serve the turn, if God be with them. Magistrates and ministers are shepherds and principal men raised in defence of religion's righteous cause against the powers of sin and Satan in the world. 3*rd.* The opposition given to the church shall be got over, and the opposers brought down. This is represented by the laying of Assyria and Chaldea waste, which two nations were the most formidable enemies to the Israel of God of any, and the destruction of them signified the making of Christ's enemies his footstool. "They shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword," and "the land of Nimrod in the entrance thereof;" they shall make inroads upon the land, and put all to the sword that they find in arms. Note, Those that threatened ruin to the church of God hasten ruin to themselves, and their destruction is the church's salvation: thus shall he "deliver us from the Assyrian." When "Satan fell as lightning from heaven," before the preaching of the Gospel, and Christ's enemies, that would not have him to reign over them, were slain before him, then this was fulfilled.

7 And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many
As a dew from the LORD, [people
As the showers upon the grass,
That tarrieth not for man,
Nor waiteth for the sons of men.
8 And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles
In the midst of many people
As a lion among the beasts of the forest,
As a young lion among the flocks of sheep:
Who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth
And none can deliver. [in pieces,
9 Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries,
And all thine enemies shall be cut off.
10 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD,
That I will cut off thy horses out of the midst of thee,
And I will destroy thy chariots:
11 And I will cut off the cities of thy land,
And throw down all thy strong holds:
12 And I will cut off witchcrafts out of thine hand;

And thou shalt have no more soothsayers:
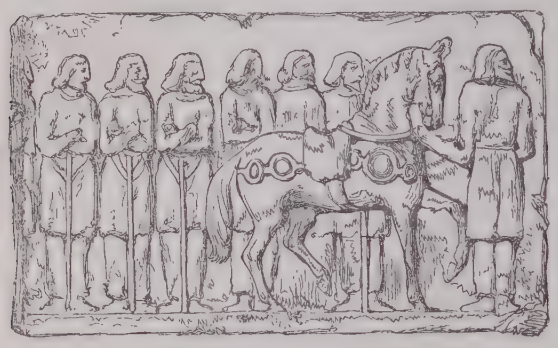
13 Thy graven images also will I cut off,
And thy standing images out of the midst of thee;
And thou shalt no more worship the work of thine hands.
14 And I will pluck up thy groves out of the midst of thee:
So will I destroy thy cities.
15 And I will execute vengeance in anger and fury upon the heathen,
Such as they have not heard.



HORSE OF STATE.—FROM A SCULPTURE NEAR SHAPOR.

Glorious things are here spoken of the remnant of Jacob, that remnant which was raised of her that halted, ch. iv. 7; and it seems to be that "remnant which the Lord our God shall call," Joel ii. 32, on whom the Spirit shall be poured out; the remnant that shall be saved, Rom. ix. 27. Note, God's people are but a remnant, a small number, in comparison with the many that are left to perish. A little flock, but they are the remnant of Jacob, a people in covenant with God, and in his favour. Now, concerning this remnant, it is here promised,

First. That they shall be as a dew in the midst of the nations, ver. 7. God's church is dispersed all the world over; it is "in the midst of many people," as gold in the ore, wheat in the heap. Israel according to the flesh dwelt alone, and was not numbered among the nations; but the spiritual Israel lies scattered "in the midst of many people," as the "salt of the earth," or as seed sown in the ground, here a grain and there a grain, Hos. ii. 23. Now this remnant shall be "as dew from the Lord." 1. They shall be of heavenly extraction, as dew from the Lord, who is the father of the rain, and hath "begotten the drops of the dew," Job xxxviii. 28. They are born from above, and are not of the earth, savouring the things of the earth. 2. They shall be numerous as the drops of dew in a summer's morning; Ps. cx. 3, "Thou hast the dew of thy youth." 3. They shall be pure and clear, not muddy and corrupt, but crystal drops, as the water of life. 4. They shall be produced silently and without noise, as the dew that distils insensibly, we know not how; such is the way of the Spirit. 5. They shall live in a continual dependence upon God, and be still deriving from him, as the dew, which "tarrieth not for man," nor "waiteth for the sons of men." They should not rely upon human aids and powers, but on Divine grace, for they are, and own that they are, no more than what the free grace of God makes them every day. 6. They shall be great blessings to those among whom they live, as the dew and the showers are to the grass, to make it grow without the help of man, or the sons of men. Their doctrine, example, and prayers shall make them as dew to soften and moisten others, and make them fruitful. Their speech shall distil as the dew, Deu. xxxii. 2; and all about them shall "wait for them as for the rain," Job xxix. 23. The people among whom they live shall be as the grass, which flourisheth only by the blessing of God, and not by the art or care of man. They shall be beneficial to those about them by drawing down God's blessings on them, as Jacob on Laban's house, and by cooling and mitigating God's wrath, which otherwise would burn them up, as the dew preserves the grass from being scorched by the sun; so Dr. Pocock. They shall be mild and gentle in their behaviour, like their Master, who comes down "like rain upon the new-mown grass," Ps. lxxii. 6.

Secondly. That they shall be "as a lion among the beasts of the forest," that treads down and tears in pieces, ver. 8. As they shall be silent, and gentle, and communicative of all good to those that receive the truth in the love of it, so they shall be bold as a lion in witnessing against the corruptions of the times and places they live in, and strong as a lion in the strength of God to resist and overcome their spiritual enemies. The "weapons of their warfare are mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong holds," 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. They shall have "courage, which all their adversaries should not be able to resist," Lu. xxi. 15; as when the lion tears, none can deliver. When infidelity is silenced, and all iniquity made to stop her mouth, when sinners are convinced and converted by the power of the Gospel in the doctrine of its ministers and the conversation of its professors, then the remnant of Jacob is like a lion. This is explained, ver. 9, "Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries;" the church shall have the upper hand at last of all that oppose her. Her "enemies shall be cut off;" that is, they shall cease to be enemies, their enmity shall be cut off. Christ's arrows of conviction shall be sharp in their hearts, so that they shall "fall under him;" that is, they shall yield themselves subjects to him, Ps. xlv. 5, and be happily conquered and subdued, Ps. cx. 2.

Thirdly. That they shall be brought off from all carnal confidences which they had relied on; that by the providence of God they should enjoy such a security as that they should not need them; and by the grace of God they should be brought to see the folly of them, and come off from them. It was the sin of Israel that they furnished themselves extravagantly with horses and chariots, and were soothsayers and idolaters; (see Isa. ii. 6—8;) but here it is promised that they should not regard them any more. The tranquillity of the kingdom of Christ is intended in that promise, which explains this, Zech. ix. 10, "I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem." Note, It is a great mercy to be deprived of those things which we have reposed a confidence in, in competition with God, which we have made our arm, and after which we have gone a whoring from God. Let us observe the particulars: 1. They had trusted in chariots and horses, and multiplied them, Ps. xx. 7; but now God will cut off their horses, and destroy their chariots, ver. 10, as "David houghed the chariot-horses," 2 Sam. viii. 4. They shall not have them, lest they should be tempted to trust in them. 2. They depended upon their strongholds and fortified cities for their security, but God will take care that they be demolished; ver. 11, "I will cut off the cities of thy land;" that is, "I will throw down thy strongholds." They shall have them for habitations, but not for garrisons, for God will be their only place of defence, their high tower and their deliverer. 3. Many of them depended much upon the conduct and advice of their conjurers, diviners, and fortune-tellers, and those God will cut off, not only as weak things, and insufficient to relieve them, but as wicked things, and sufficient to ruin them; ver. 12, "I will cut off witchcrafts out of thine hand," that thou shalt no more take hold of them, and stay thyself upon them; and "thou shalt have no more soothsayers," for thou shalt be convinced that all their pretensions are a cheat. The justice of the nation shall cut them off according to the law, Lev. xx. 27; the preaching of the Gospel brought men off from using curious arts, Acts xix. 19. 4. Many of them had said to the work of their hands, Ye are our gods; but now idolatry shall be abolished and abandoned; ver. 13, "Thy graven images will I cut off, and thy standing images," both those that were moveable and those that were fixed. They shall be destroyed by the power of the law of Moses, and deserted by the power of the Gospel of Christ, so that "thou shalt no more worship the work of thy hands," but be ashamed that ever thou hast been so deluded. Among other monuments of idolatry, "I will pluck up thy groves out of the midst of thee," ver. 14, which were planted and preserved in honour of their idols, and used in the worship of them. These they were ordered to burn, Deu. xii. 2, 3; and if they do not, God will, so as that they shall not have them to trust to. And so "will I destroy thy cities," meaning the cities that were dedicated to the idols, to some or other dunghill deity, which they confided in for their protection.

Fourthly. That those who stand it out against the Gospel of Christ, and continue in league with their idolatries and witchcrafts, shall fall under the wrath of God, and be consumed by it; ver. 15, "I will execute vengeance in anger and fury upon the heathen," that is, upon the heathenism, "such as they have not heard." Idolatries shall be done away, and idolaters put to shame. I will execute vengeance upon the heathen which have not heard, (so some read it,) or which would not hear and receive the doctrine of Christ. God will give his Son either the hearts or the necks of his enemies, and make them either his friends or his footstool.

CHAPTER VI.

After the precious promises in the two foregoing chapters, relating to the Messiah's kingdom, the prophet is here directed to set the sins of Israel in order before them, for their conviction and humiliation, as necessary to make way for the comfort of gospel grace. Christ's forerunner was a reprover, and preached repentance, and so prepared his way. Here, I. God enters an action against his people for their base ingratitude, and the ill returns they had made him for his favours, ver. 1—5. II. He shews the wrong course they took, when they were under convictions, and the frivolous proposals they made, in answer to his charge, and what course they should have taken, ver. 6—8. III. He calls upon them to hear the voice of his judgments, and set the sins in order before them, for which he still proceeded in his controversy with them, ver. 9; their injustice, ver. 10—15; and their idolatry, ver. 16; for both which ruin was coming upon them.

HEAR ye now what the LORD saith;
Arise, contend thou before the mountains,
And let the hills hear thy voice.
2 Hear ye, O mountains, the LORD's controversy,
And ye strong foundations of the earth:
For the LORD hath a controversy with his people,
And he will plead with Israel.
3 O my people, what have I done unto thee?
And wherein have I wearied thee?
Testify against me.
4 For I brought thee up out of the land of Egypt,
And redeemed thee out of the house of servants;
And I sent before thee Moses, Aaron, and Miriam.
5 O my people, remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted,
And what Balaam the son of Beor answered him
From Shittim unto Gilgal;
That ye may know the righteousness of the LORD.

Here, First. The prefaces to the message are very solemn, and such as may engage our most serious attention. 1. The people are commanded to give audience, "Hear ye now what the Lord saith." What the prophet speaks, he speaks from God, and in his name, they are therefore bound to hear it, not as the word of a sinful, dying man, but of the holy, living God. Hear now what he saith, for, first or last, he will be heard. 2. The prophet is commanded to speak in earnest, and to put an emphasis upon what he said, "Arise, contend thou before the mountains," or with the mountains, "and let the hills hear thy voice," if it were possible. Contend with the mountains and hills of Judæa, that is, with the inhabitants of those mountains and hills; and some think reference is had to those mountains and hills on which they worshipped idols, and which by that means were polluted. But it is rather to be taken more generally, as appears by his call, not only to the mountains, but to the "strong foundations of the earth," pursuant to the instructions given him. This is designed, 1st. To excite the earnestness of the prophet. He must speak as vehemently as if he designed to make even the hills and mountains hear him, must cry aloud and not spare; what he has to say in God's name he must proclaim publicly before the mountains, as one that was neither ashamed nor afraid to own his message; he must speak as one concerned, and one that desired to speak to the heart, and therefore appeared to speak from the heart. 2nd. To expose the stupidity of the people; "Let the hills hear thy voice," for this senseless, careless people will not hear it, will not heed it. Let the rocks, the foundation of the earth, that have no ears, hear, since Israel, that has ears, will not hear. It is an appeal to the mountains and hills; let them bear witness that Israel has fair warning given them, and good counsel, if they would but take it. Thus Isaiah begins with, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth." Let them judge between God and his vineyard.

Secondly. The message itself is very affecting. He is to let all the world know that God has a quarrel with his people, good ground for an action against them. Their offences are public, and therefore so are the articles of impeachment exhibited against them. Take notice, "the Lord has a controversy with his people, and he will plead with Israel," will plead by his prophets, plead by his providences, to make good his charge. Note, 1. Sin begets a controversy between God and man. The righteous God has an action against every sinner, an action of debt, an action of trespass, an action of slander. 2. If Israel, God's own professing people, provoke him by sin, he will let them know that he has a controversy with them. He sees sin in them, and is displeased with it; nay, their sins are more displeasing to him than the sins of others, as they are a greater grief to his spirit and dishonour to his name. 3. God will plead with those whom he has a controversy with, will plead with his people Israel, that they may be convinced, and that he may be justified. In the close of the foregoing chapter he pleaded with the heathen in anger and fury, to bring them to ruin, but here he pleads with Israel in compassion and tenderness, to bring them to repentance: "Come now and let us reason together;" God reasons with us, to teach us to reason with ourselves. See the equity of God's cause, it will bear to be pleaded, and sinners themselves will be forced to confess judgment, and to own that God's ways are equal, but their ways are unequal, Eze. xviii. 25. Now,

1. God here challengeth them to shew what he had done against them which might give them occasion to desert him. They had revolted from God, and rebelled against him; but had they any cause to do so? ver. 3. "O my people, what have I done unto thee? Wherein have I wearied thee?" If subjects quit their allegiance to their prince, they will pretend, as the ten tribes did, when they revolted from Rehoboam, that his yoke is too heavy for them; but can you pretend any such thing? What have I done to you that is unjust or unkind? Wherein have I wearied you with the impositions of service, or the exactions of tribute? "Have I made you to serve with an offering?" Isa. xliii. 23. "What iniquity have your fathers found in me?" Jer. ii. 5. He never deceived us, or disappointed our expectations from him, never did us wrong, or put disgrace upon us; why, then, do we wrong and dishonour him, and frustrate his expectations from us? Here is a challenge to all that ever were in God's service, to testify against him, if they have found him in any thing a hard master, and his demands unreasonable.

2. Since they could not shew any thing he had done against them, he will show them a great deal he has done for them, which should have engaged them for ever to his service, ver. 4, 5. They are here directed, and we in them, to look a great way back in their reviews of the Divine favour; let them remember their former days, their first days, when they were formed into a people, and the great things God did for them:

1st. When he brought them out of Egypt, the land of their bondage, ver. 4. They were content with their slavery, and almost in love with their chains, for the sake of the garlic and onions they had plenty of; but God brought them up, inspired them with an ambition of liberty, and animated them with a resolution, by a bold effort, to shake off their fetters. The Egyptians held them fast, and would not let the people go, but God redeemed them, not by price, but by force, "out of the house of servants," or rather, "the house of bondage," for it is the same word that is used in the preface to the ten commandments; which insinuates that the same considerations which are arguments for duty, if they be not improved by us, will be improved against us as aggravations of sin. When he brought them out of Egypt into a vast howling wilderness, as he left not himself without witness, so he left not them without guides, for he sent before them Moses, Aaron, and Miriam,—three prophets, saith the Chaldee paraphrase: Moses, the great prophet of the Old Testament; Aaron, his prophet, Ex. vii. 1; and Miriam, a prophetess, Ex. xv. 20. Note, When we are calling to mind God's former mercies to us, we must not forget the mercy of good teachers and governors when we were young; let those be made mention of to the glory of God, who went before us, saying, This is the way, walk in it. It was God that sent them before us, to prepare the way of the Lord, and to prepare a people for him.

2nd. When he brought them into Canaan. God no less glorified himself, and honoured them, in what he did for them when he brought them into the land of their rest, than in what he did for them when he brought them out of the land of their servitude. When Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, were dead, yet they found God the same. Let them remember now what God did for them, First. In baffling and defeating the designs of Balak and Balaam against them, which he did by the power he has over the hearts and tongues of men, ver. 5. Let them remember "what Balak the king of Moab consulted," what mischief he devised and designed to do to Israel, when they encamped in the plains of Moab; that which he consulted was to curse Israel, to divide between them and their God, and to disengage him from the protection of them. Among the heathen, when they made war upon any people, they endeavoured by magic, charms, or otherwise, to get from them their tutelar gods, as to rob Troy of its palladium. Macrobius has a chapter De ritu evocandi deos,—'concerning the solemnity of calling out the gods.' This Balak would try against Israel; but remember "what Balaam the son of Beor answered him," how, contrary to his own intention and inclination, instead of cursing Israel he blessed them, to the extreme confusion and vexation of Balak. Let them remember the malice of the heathen against them, and for that reason never "learn the way of the heathen," or associate with them; let them remember the kindness of their God to them, how he "turned the curse into a blessing, because the Lord thy God loved thee," as it is Deu. xxiii. 5, and for that reason never forsake him. Note, The disappointing of the devices of the church's enemies ought always to be remembered to the glory of the church's Protector, who can make the answer of the tongue directly to contradict the preparation and consultation of the heart, Pr. xvi. 1. Secondly. In bringing them from Shittim, their last lodgment out of Canaan, unto Gilgal, their first lodgment in Canaan. There it was, between Shittim and Gilgal, that, upon the death of Moses, Joshua, a type of Christ, was raised up to put Israel in possession of the land of promise, and to fight their battles. There it was that they passed over Jordan, through the divided waters, and renewed the covenant of circumcision; these mercies of God to their fathers they must now remember, that they may know the righteousness of the Lord,—his righteousness, so the word is; his justice in destroying the Canaanites, his goodness in giving rest to his people Israel, and his faithfulness to his promise made unto the fathers. The remembrance of what God had done for them might convince them of all this, and engage them for ever to his service. Or, they may refer to the controversy now pleaded between God and Israel; let them remember God's many favours to them and their fathers, and compare with them their unworthy, ungrateful carriage towards him, that they may know the righteousness of the Lord in contending with them; and it may appear that in this controversy he has right on his side. His ways are equal, for he will be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judgeth.

6 Wherewith shall I come before the LORD,
And bow myself before the high God?
Shall I come before him with burnt offerings,
With calves of a year old?
7 Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams,
Or with ten thousands of rivers of oil?
Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression,
The fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?
8 He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good;
And what doth the LORD require of thee,
But to do justly, and to love mercy,
And to walk humbly with thy God?

Here is the proposal for accommodation between God and Israel, the parties that were at variance in the beginning of the chapter. Upon the trial, judgment is given against Israel, they are convicted of injustice and ingratitude towards God, the crimes with which they stood charged; it is too plain to be denied, too bad to be excused. And therefore,

First. They express their desires to be at peace with God upon any terms; ver. 6, 7, "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord?" Being made sensible of the justice of God's controversy with them, and dreading the consequences of it, they were inquisitive what they might do to be reconciled to God, and to make him their friend. They apply themselves to a proper person with this inquiry,—to the prophet, the Lord's messenger, by whose ministry they had been convinced. Who so fit to shew them their way as he that had made them sensible of their having missed it? And it is observable that each one speaks for himself. "Wherewith shall I come?" Knowing every one the plague of his own heart, they ask not, What shall this man do? but, What shall I do? Note, Deep convictions of guilt and wrath will put men upon careful inquiries after peace and pardon, and then, and not till then, there begins to be some hopes of them. They inquire wherewith they may come before the Lord, and bow themselves before the high God. They believe there is a God, that he is Jehovah, and that he is the high God, the Most High. They whose consciences are convinced have learned to speak very honourably of God, whom before they spake slightly of. Now, 1. We know we must come before God. He is the God with whom we have to do; we must come as subjects to pay our homage to him, as beggars to ask alms from him; nay, we must come before him as criminals, to receive our doom from him, must come before him as our Judge. 2. When we come before him we must bow before him; it is our duty to be very humble and reverent in our approaches to him, and when we come before him there is no remedy but we must submit; it is to no purpose to contend with him. 3. When we come and bow before him, it is our great concern to find favour with him, and to be accepted of him; their inquiry is, What will the Lord be pleased with? Note, All that rightly understand themselves and their own interest cannot but be solicitous what they must do to please God, to avoid his displeasure, and to obtain his goodwill. 4. In order to God's being pleased with us, our care must be that the sin by which we have displeased him may be taken away, and an atonement made for it. The inquiry here is, "What shall I give for my transgression," for "the sin of my soul?" Note, The transgression we are guilty of is the sin of our soul; for the soul acts it,—without the soul's act it is not sin; and the soul suffers by it,—it is the disorder, disease, and defilement of the soul, and threatens to be the death of it; "What shall I give for my transgression?" What will be accepted as a satisfaction of his justice, a reparation of his honour? and what will avail to shelter me from his wrath? 5. We must therefore ask, Wherewith may we come before him? We must not appear before the Lord empty. What shall we bring with us? In what manner must we come? In whose name must we come? We have not that in ourselves which will recommend us to him, but must have it from another; what righteousness then shall we appear before him in?

Secondly. They make proposals, such as they are, in order to it. Their inquiry was very good and right, and what we are all concerned to make; but their proposals betray their ignorance, though they shew their zeal; let us examine them,

1. They bid high. They offer, 1st. That which is very rich and costly—thousands of rams. God required one ram for a sin offering; they proffer flocks of them, their whole stock, will be content to make themselves beggars, so that they may but be at peace with God. They will bring the best they have, the rams, and the most of them, till it comes to thousands. 2nd. That which is very dear to them, and which they would be most loath to part with. They could be content to part with their firstborn for their transgressions, if that would be accepted as an atonement, and the fruit of their body for the sin of their soul. To them that were become vain in their imaginations, this seemed a probable expedient of making satisfaction for sin, because our children are pieces of ourselves, and therefore the heathen sacrificed their children to appease their offended deities. Note, Those that are thoroughly convinced of sin, of the malignity of it, and of their misery and danger by reason of it, would give all the world, if they had it, for peace and pardon.

2. Yet they do not bid right. It is true some of these things were instituted by the ceremonial law, as the bringing of burnt offerings to God's altar, and calves of a year old,—rams for sin offerings, and oil for the meat offerings; but these alone would not recommend them to God. God had often declared that to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams; that sacrifice and offering he would not. The legal sacrifices had their virtue and value from the institution and reference they had to Christ the great propitiation; but otherwise, of themselves, it was impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sin. And as to the other things here mentioned, 1st. Some of them are impracticable things, as rivers of oil, which nature has not provided to feed men's luxury, but rivers of water, to supply men's necessity. All the proposals of peace, but those that are according to the Gospel, are absurd. One stream of the blood of Christ is worth ten thousand rivers of oil. 2nd. Some of them are wicked things, as to give our firstborn and the fruit of our body to death, which would but add to the transgression and the sin of the soul. He that hates robbery for burnt offerings much more hateth murder, such murder. What right have we to our firstborn, and the fruit of our body? Do they not belong to God? Are they not his already, and born to him? Are they not sinners by nature, and their lives forfeited upon their own account? How then can they be a ransom for ours? 3rd. They are all external things, parts of that bodily exercise which profiteth little, and which could not make the comers thereunto perfect. 4th. They are all insignificant, and insufficient to attain the end proposed. They could not answer the demands of Divine justice, nor satisfy the wrong done to God in his honour by sin; nor would they serve in lieu of the sanctification of the heart and the reformation of the life. Men will part with any thing rather than their sins, but they part with nothing to God's acceptance unless they part with them.

Thirdly. God tells them plainly what he demands and insists upon from those that would be accepted of him, ver. 8. Let their money perish with them that think the pardon of sin, and the favour of God, may be so purchased. No; God "hath shewed thee, O man, what is good." Here we are told,

1. That God hath made a discovery of his mind and will to us, for the rectifying of our mistakes, and the directing of our practice. 1st. It is God himself that hath shewed us what we must do. We need not trouble ourselves to make proposals, the terms are already settled and laid down. He whom we have offended, and to whom we are accountable, hath told us upon what conditions he will be reconciled to us. 2nd. It is to man that he hath shewed it; not only to thee, O Israel, but to thee, O man, Gentiles as well as Jews. To men that are rational creatures, and capable of receiving the discovery, and not to brutes; to men for whom a remedy is provided, not to devils, whose case is desperate. What is spoken to all men, every where in general, must by faith be applied to ourselves in particular, as if it were spoken to thee, O man, by name, and to no other. 3rd. It is a discovery of that which is good, and which the Lord requires of us. He hath shewed us our end which we should aim at, in shewing us what is good, wherein our true happiness doth consist. He hath shewed us our way in which we must walk towards that end, in shewing us what he requires of us. There is something which God requires we should do for him, and devote to him; and it is good, it is good in itself. There is an innate goodness in moral duties, antecedent to the command; they are not as ceremonial observances, therefore good because they are commanded, but therefore commanded because they are good; consonant to the eternal rule and reason of good and evil, which is unalterable. It has likewise a direct tendency to our good; our conformity to it is not only the condition of our future happiness, but it is a great expedient of our present happiness. In keeping God's commandments there is a great reward, as well as after keeping them. 4th. It is shewed us. God has not only made it known, but made it plain; he hath discovered it to us with such convincing evidence as amounts to a demonstration; "Lo this, we have searched it, so it is."

2. What that discovery is. The good which God requires of us is not the paying of a price for the pardon of sin, and acceptance with God, but doing the duty, which is the condition of our interest in the pardon purchased. 1st. We must do justly, must render to all their due, according as our relation and obligation to them is; must do wrong to none, but do right to all, in their bodies, goods, and good name. 2nd. We must love mercy, not only be just to all we deal with, but kind to all that need us, and that we are in a capacity of doing good to. Nor must we only shew mercy, but we must love mercy, we must delight in it, as our God doth, must be glad of an opportunity to do good, and do it cheerfully. Justice is put before mercy, for we must not give that in alms which is wrongfully got, or with which our debts should be paid; God hates robbery for a burnt offering. 3rd. We must walk humbly with our God. This includes all the duties of the first table, as the two former do all the duties of the second table. We must take the Lord for our God in covenant, must attend on him, and adhere to him as ours, and must make it our constant care and business to please him. Enoch's walking with God is interpreted, Heb. xi. 5, his pleasing God. We must in the whole course of our conversation conform ourselves to the will of God, keep up our communion with God, and study to approve ourselves to him in our integrity. And this we must do humbly, (submitting our understandings to the truths of God, and our wills to his precepts and providences,) we must humble ourselves to walk with God, so the margin reads it; every thought within us must be brought down, to be brought into obedience to God, if we would walk comfortably with him. This is that which God requires, and without which the most costly services are vain oblations; this is more than all burnt offerings and sacrifices.

9 The LORD's voice crieth unto the city,
And the man of wisdom shall see thy name:
Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it.
10 Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked,
And the scant measure that is abominable?
11 Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances,
And with the bag of deceitful weights?
12 For the rich men thereof are full of violence,
And the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies,
And their tongue is deceitful in their mouth.
13 Therefore also will I make thee sick in smiting thee,
In making thee desolate because of thy sins.
14 Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied;
And thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee;
And thou shalt take hold, but shalt not deliver;
And that which thou deliverest will I give up to the [sword.
15 Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap;
Thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil;
And sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine.
16 For the statutes of Omri are kept,
And all the works of the house of Ahab,
And ye walk in their counsels;
That I should make thee a desolation,
And the inhabitants thereof an hissing:
Therefore ye shall bear the reproach of my people.

God having shewed them how necessary it was that they should do justly, here shews them how plain it was that they had done unjustly; and since they submitted not to his controversy, nor went the right way to have it taken up, here he proceeds in it. Observe,

First. How the action is entered against them, ver. 9. God speaks to the city, to Jerusalem, to Samaria; his voice cries to it, by his servants the prophets, who were to cry aloud and spare not. Note, The voice of the prophets is the Lord's voice, and that cries to the city, cries to the country. Doth not wisdom cry? Pr. viii. 1. When the sin of a city cries to God, his voice cries against the city, and when the judgments of God are coming upon a city, his voice first cries unto it; he warns before he wounds, because he is not willing that any should perish. Now observe,

1. How the voice of God is discerned by some. "The man of wisdom will see thy name." When the voice of God cries to us we may by it see his name, may discern and perceive that by which he makes himself known. Yet many see it not, are not aware of it, because they do not regard it; God "speaketh once, yea twice, and they perceive it not," Job xxxiii. 14; but they that are men of wisdom will see it, and perceive it, and make a good use of it. Note, It is a point of true wisdom to discover the name of God in the voice of God, and to learn what he is from what he saith. "Wisdom shall see thy name;" for "the knowledge of the holy is understanding."

2. What this voice of God saith to all; "Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it." Hear the rod when it is coming, hear it at a distance, before you see it and feel it; and be awakened to go forth to meet the Lord in the way of his judgments. Hear the rod when it is come, and is actually upon you, and you are sensible of the smart of it; hear what it saith to you, what convictions, what counsels, what cautions it speaks to you. Note, Every rod has a voice, and it is the voice of God that is to be heard in the rod of God, and it is well for them that understand the language of it; which if we would do, we must have an eye to him that appointed it. Note, Every rod is appointed, of what kind it shall be, where it shall light, and how long it shall lie. God in every affliction "performeth the thing that is appointed for us," Job xxiii. 14; and to him therefore we must have an eye, to him we must have an ear; hear what he saith to us by the affliction, "hear it, and know it for thy good," Job v. 6. The work of ministers is to explain the providences of God, and to quicken and direct men to learn the lessons that are taught by them.

Secondly. What is the ground of the action, and what are the things that are laid to their charge.

1. They are charged with injustice, a sin against the second table. Are there yet to be found among them the marks and means of fraudulent dealing? What, after all the methods that God has taken to teach them to do justly, will they yet deal unjustly? It seems they will, ver. 10; and "Shall I count them pure?" ver. 11. No, this is a sin which will by no means consist with a profession of purity. Those that are dishonest in their dealings have not the spots of God's children, and shall never be reckoned pure, whatever shows of devotion they may make. Be not deceived, God is not mocked. When a man is suspected of theft or fraud the justice of peace will send a warrant to search his house. God here doth as it were search the houses of these citizens, and there he finds, 1st. Treasures of wickedness. Abundance of wealth, but it is ill got, and not like to prosper; for treasures of wickedness profit nothing. 2nd. A scant measure by which they sold to the poor, and so exacted from them and cheated them. 3rd. They had wicked balances and a bag of false weights, by which, under a pretence of weighing what they sold, and giving the buyer what was right, they did him the greatest wrong, ver. 11. 4th. Those that had wealth and power in their hands abused it to oppression and extortion. "The rich men thereof are full of violence;" for they that have much would have more, and are in a capacity of making it more by the power which their abundance of wealth gives them. They are full of violence; that is, they have their houses full of that which is got by violence. 5th. Those that had not advantage of doing wrong by their wealth yet found means of defrauding those they dealt with. "The inhabitants thereof have spoken lies;" if they are not able to use force and violence, they use fraud and deceit. "The inhabitants" have "spoken lies, and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth;" they do not stick at a deliberate lie to make a good bargain. Some understand it of their speaking falsely concerning God, saying, "The Lord seeth not. He hath forsaken the earth," Eze. viii. 12.

2. They are charged with idolatry; ver. 16, "The statutes of Omri are kept, and all the work of the house of Ahab." Both these kings were wicked, and "did evil in the sight of the Lord;" but the wickedness which they established by a law, concerning which they made statutes, and which was the peculiar work of that house, was idolatry. Omri walked in the way of Jeroboam, and in his sin of provoking God to anger with their vanities, 1 Kin. xvi. 26; Ahab introduced the worship of Baal, 1 Kin. xvi. 31. These reigns were some ages before the time when this prophet lived, and yet the wickedness which they established by their laws and examples remained to this day; those statutes were still kept, and that work was still done; and the princes and people still walked in their counsels, took the same measures, and governed themselves and the people by the same politics. Observe, 1st. The same wickedness continued from one generation to another. Sin is a root of bitterness soon planted; but not so soon plucked up again. The iniquity of former ages is often transmitted to, and entailed upon, the succeeding ones. Those that make corrupt laws, and bring in corrupt usages, are doing that which perhaps may prove the ruin of the child unborn. 2nd. It was never the less evil in itself, provoking to God, and dangerous to the sinners, for its having been established and confirmed by the laws of princes, the examples of great men, and a long prescription. Though the worship of idols is enacted by the statutes of Omri, recommended by the practice of the house of Ahab, and pleads that usage of many generations, yet it is still displeasing to God and destructive to Israel; for no laws or customs are of force against the Divine command.

Thirdly. What is the judgment given upon this. Being found guilty of these crimes, the sentence is, that which God had given them warning of, ver. 9, shall he brought upon them; ver. 13, "Therefore also will I make thee sick in smiting thee." As they had smitten the poor with the rod of their oppressions, so would God in like manner smite them so as to make them sick, sick of the gains they had unjustly gotten; so that, though they had swallowed down riches, they should vomit them up again, Job xx. 15. Their doom is,

1. That what they have they shall not have any comfortable enjoyment of. It shall do them no good; they grasped at more than enough, but when they have it, it shall not be enough to make them easy and happy. What is got by fraud and oppression cannot be kept or enjoyed with any satisfaction. 1st. Their food shall not nourish them; "Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied;" either because the food shall not digest, for want of God's blessing going along with it, or because the appetite shall by disease be made insatiable, and still craving,—the just punishment of those that were greedy of gain, and enlarged their desire as hell. Men may be surfeited with the good things of this world, and yet not satisfied, Eccl. v. 10; Isa. lv. 2. 2nd. Their country shall not harbour and protect them; "Thy casting down shall be in the midst of them;" that is, thou shalt be broken and ruined by intestine troubles, mischiefs at home enough to cast thee down, though thou shouldst not be invaded by a foreign force. God can cast a nation down by that which is in the midst of them, can consume them by a fire in their own bowels. 3rd. They shall not be able to preserve what they have from a foreign force, nor to recover what they have lost; "Thou shalt take hold" of what is about to be taken from thee, but thou shalt not hold it fast; shalt catch at it, but thou shalt not deliver it, shalt not retrieve it. It is meant of their wives and children, that were dear to them, which they took hold of, as resolved not to part with them; but there is no remedy, they must go into captivity. Note, What we hold closest we commonly lose soonest, and that proves least safe which is most dear. 4th. What they save for a time shall be reserved for a future and sorer stroke; That which thou deliverest out of the hand of one enemy will I give up to the sword of another enemy; for God has many arrows in his quiver,—if one miss the sinner, the next shall not. 5th. What they have laboured for they shall not enjoy; ver. 15, "Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap;" either it shall be blasted and withered, and there shall be nothing to reap, or an enemy shall come and reap it for himself, or thou shalt be carried into captivity, and leave it to be reaped by thou knowest not whom. Thou shalt "tread the olives," but "thou shalt not anoint thee with oil;" having no heart to make use of ornaments and refreshments, when all is going to ruin. Thou shalt tread out the sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine, for many things may fall between the cup and the lip. Note, It is very grievous to be disappointed of our expectations, and not to have the pleasure of that which we have taken pains for; and this will be the just punishment of those that frustrate God's expectations from them, and answer not the cost he has been at upon them. See this threatened in the law, Lev. xxvi. 16; Deu. xxviii. 30, 38, &c., and compare Isa. lxii. 8, 9.

2. That all they have shall at length be taken from them; ver. 13, "Thou shalt be made desolate, because of thy sins;" and, ver. 16, "a desolation and a hissing." Sin makes a nation desolate; and when a people that have been famous and flourishing are made desolate, it is the astonishment of some, and the triumph of others; some lament it, and others hiss at it. Thus "ye shall hear the reproach of my people." Their being the people of God in name and profession, while they kept close to their duty, and kept themselves in his love, was an honour to them, and all their neighbours thought it so. But now they have corrupted and ruined themselves, now their sins and God's judgments have made their land desolate, their having been once the people of God doth but turn so much the more to their reproach; their enemies will say, "These are the people of the Lord," Eze. xxxvi. 20. Note, If professors of religion ruin themselves, their ruin will be the most reproachful of any other; and they in a special manner will rise at the last day to everlasting shame and contempt.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter, I. The prophet in the name of the church sadly laments the woful decay of religion in the age wherein he lived, and the deluge of impiety and immorality which overwhelmed the nation, which levelled the differences, and bore down the fences of all that is just and sacred, ver. 1—6. II. The prophet, for the sake of the church, prescribes comforts which may be of use at such a time, and gives counsel what to do: 1. They must have an eye to God, ver. 7; 2. They must courageously bear up against the insolences of the enemy, ver. 8—10; 3. They must patiently lie down under the rebukes of their God, ver. 9; 4. They must expect no other but that the trouble would continue long, and must endeavour to make the best of it, ver. 11—13; 5. They must encourage themselves with God's promises, in answer to the prophet's prayers, ver. 14, 15; 6. They must foresee the fall of their enemies, that now triumph over them, ver. 16, 17; 7. They must themselves triumph in the mercy and grace of God, and his faithfulness to his covenant, ver. 18—20; and with that comfortable word the prophecy concludes.

WOE is me! [fruits,
For I am as when they have gathered the summer
As the grapegleanings of the vintage: [fruit.
There is no cluster to eat: my soul desired the firstripe
2 The good man is perished out of the earth:
And there is none upright among men:
They all lie in wait for blood;
They hunt every man his brother with a net.
3 That they may do evil with both hands earnestly,
The prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward;
And the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire:
So they wrap it up.
4 The best of them is as a brier:
The most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge:
The day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh;
Now shall be their perplexity.
5 Trust ye not in a friend,
Put ye not confidence in a guide:
Keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy 6 For the son dishonoureth the father, [bosom.
The daughter riseth up against her mother,
The daughter in law against her mother in law;
A man's enemies are the men of his own house.

This is such a description of bad times as some think could scarce agree with the times of Hezekiah, when this prophet prophesied; and therefore they rather take it as a prediction of what should be in the reign of Manasseh. But we may rather suppose it to be in the reign of Ahaz, (and in that reign he prophesied, ch. i. 1,) or in the beginning of Hezekiah's time, before the reformation he was instrumental in; nay, in the best of his days, and when he had done his best to purge out corruptions, still there was much amiss. The prophet cries out, Woe is me! he bemoans himself that his lot was cast in such a degenerate age, and thinks it his great unhappiness that he lived among a people that were ripening apace for a ruin which many a good man would unavoidably be involved in. Thus David cries out, "Woe is me, that I sojourn in Meshech." He laments it,

First. That there were so few good people to be found, even among those that were called God's people; and this was their reproach, spoken of ch. v. 6, "The good man is perished out of the earth," or out of the land, the land of Canaan. It was a good land, and a land of uprightness, Isa. xxvi. 10; but there were few good men in it, none upright among them, ver. 2. The good man is a godly man and a merciful man, the word signifies both. Those are completely good men that are devout towards God, and compassionate and beneficent towards men, that love mercy and walk with God. These are perished; those few honest men that some time ago enriched and adorned our country are now dead and gone, and there are none risen up in their stead, that tread in their steps. Honesty is banished, and there is no such thing as a good man to be met with. Those that were of religious education are degenerated, and become as bad as the worst; "The godly man ceaseth," Ps. xii. 1. This is illustrated by a comparison, ver. 1. They were "as when they have gathered the summer-fruits;" it was as hard a thing to find a good man as to find any of the summer-fruits, (which were the choicest and best, and therefore must carefully be gathered in,) when the harvest is over. The prophet is ready to say, as Elijah in his time, 1 Kin. xix. 10, "I, even I only am left." Good men, that used to hang in clusters, are now as the "grape-gleanings of the vintage," here and there a berry, Isa. xvii. 6. You can find no societies of them, as bunches of grapes, but those that are are single persons; "There is no cluster to eat," and the best and fullest grapes are those that grow in large clusters. Some think this speaks not only the fewness of good people, but that those which remained, that went for good people, were good for little; like the small withered grapes, the refuse that were left behind, not only by the gatherer, but by the gleaner. When the prophet observed this universal degeneracy, it made him "desire the first-ripe fruit;" that is, he wished to see such worthy good men as were in the former ages, were the ornaments of the primitive times, and as far excelled the best of all the present age as the first and full-ripe fruits do those of the latter growth, that never come to maturity. When we read and hear of the wisdom and zeal, the strictness and conscientiousness, the devotion and charity, of the professors of religion in former ages, and see the reverse of this in those of the present age, we cannot but sit down and wish, with a sigh, 'O, for primitive Christianity again!' Where is the plainness and integrity of those that went before us? Where are the Israelites indeed without guile? Our souls desire them, but in vain. The golden age is gone, and past recall; we must make the best of what is, for we are not likely to see such times as have been.

Secondly. That there were so many wicked, mischievous people among them; not only none that did any good, but multitudes that did all the hurt they could. "They all lie in wait for blood," and "hunt every man his brother." To get wealth to themselves they care not what wrong, what hurt, they do their neighbours and nearest relations. They act as if mankind were in a state of war, and force were the only right. They are as beasts of prey to their neighbours; for "they all lie in wait for blood," as lions for their prey; they thirst after it, make nothing of taking away any man's life or livelihood to serve a turn for themselves, and lie in wait for an opportunity to do it. Their neighbours are as beasts of prey to them, for "they hunt every man his brother with a net;" they persecute them as noxious creatures, fit to be taken and destroyed, though they are innocent, excellent ones. We say of him that is outlawed, Caput gerit lupinum,—'He is to be hunted as a wolf.' Or, they hunt them as men do the game, to feast upon it; they have a thousand cursed arts of ensnaring men to their ruin, so that they may but get by it. Thus they do mischief with both hands earnestly, their hearts desire it, their heads contrive it, and then both hands are ready to put it in execution. Note, The more eager and intent men are upon any sinful pursuit, and the more pains they take in it, the more provoking it is.

Thirdly. That the magistrates, who by their office ought to have been the patrons and protectors of right, were the practisers and promoters of wrong. "That they may do evil with both hands earnestly," to excite and animate themselves in it, "the prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward," for a bribe, with which they will be hired to exert all their power, for the supporting and carrying on of any wicked design, with both hands. 'They do evil with both hands well,' so some read it. They do ill with a great deal of art and dexterity, they praise themselves for doing it so well. Others thus, 'to do evil they have both hands,' (they catch at an opportunity of doing mischief,) 'but to do good the prince and the judge ask for a reward.' If they do any good offices, they are mercenary in them, and must be paid for them. The great man, that has wealth and power to do good, he is not ashamed to utter his mischievous desire, in conjunction with the prince and the judge, who are ready to support him, and stand by him in it; so they wrap it up, they perplex the matter, involve it, and make it intricate, (so some understand it,) that they may lose equity in a mist, and so make the cause turn which way they please. It is ill with a people when their princes, and judges, and great men, are in a confederacy to pervert justice. And it is a sad character that is given of them, ver. 4, that "the best of them is as a briar, and the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge;" that is, it is a dangerous thing to have any thing to do with them: "He that toucheth them must be fenced with iron," 2 Sam. xxiii. 6, 7, he shall be sure to be scratched, to have his clothes torn, and his eyes almost pulled out. And if this be the character of the best and most upright, what are the worst? And when things are come to this pass, "the day of the watchman comes," that is, as it follows, the day of thy visitation, when God will reckon with thee for all this wickedness; which is called the day of the watchmen, because their prophets, whom God set as watchmen over them, had often warned them of that day. When all flesh have corrupted their way, even the best and the most upright, what can be expected but a day of visitation, a deluge of judgments, as that which drowned the old world, when the earth was filled with violence.

Fourthly. That there was no faith in man; people were grown so universally treacherous that one knew not who to repose any confidence in, ver. 5. Those that have any sense of honour or sparks of virtue remaining in them have a mighty regard to the laws of friendship; they would not discover what passed in private conversation, nor divulge secrets to the prejudice of a friend; but those things are now made a jest of: you will not meet with a friend that you dare trust, whose word you dare take, or who will have any tenderness or concern for you; so that wise men shall give it and take it for a rule, "Trust ye not in a friend," for you will find him false, you can trust him no farther than you can see him; and even he that passeth for an honest man you will find to be so only with good looking to. Nay, he that undertakes to be your guide, to lead you into any business which he professeth to understand better than you, yet you cannot put a confidence in him, for he will be sure to mislead you, if he can get any thing by it. Some by a guide understand a husband, who is called the guide of thy youth; and that agrees well enough with what follows, "Keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom," from thy own wife; take heed what thou sayest before her, lest she betray thee as Dalilah did Samson; lest she be the bird of the air that carries the voice of that which thou sayest in thy bedchamber, Eccl. x. 6. It is an evil time indeed when the prudent are obliged even thus far to keep silence.

Fifthly. That children were abusive to their parents, and men had no comfort, no satisfaction, in their own families and their nearest relations, ver. 6. The times are bad indeed when "the son dishonoureth his father," gives him ill language, exposeth him, threatens him, and studies to do him a mischief, "when the daughter riseth up" in rebellion against her own mother, having no sense of duty nor natural affection; and no marvel that then the daughter-in-law quarrels with her mother-in-law, and is vexatious to her. Either they cannot agree about their property or interest, or their humours and passions clash, or, from a spirit of bigotry and persecution, "The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child," Mat. x. 4; Lu. xxi. 16. It is sad when a man's betrayers and worst enemies are the "men of his own house," his own children and servants, that should be his guard, and his best friends. Note. The contempt and violation of the laws of domestic duties are a sad symptom of a universal corruption of manners. Those are never likely to come to good that are undutiful to their parents, and study to be provoking to them, and cross them.

7 Therefore I will look unto the LORD; [hear me.
I will wait for the God of my salvation: my God will 8 Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy:
When I fall, I shall arise; [me.
When I sit in darkness, the LORD shall be a light unto 9 I will bear the indignation of the LORD,
Because I have sinned against him,
Until he plead my cause, and execute judgment for me:
He will bring me forth to the light,
And I shall behold his righteousness.
10 Then she that is mine enemy shall see it,
And shame shall cover her which said unto me,
Where is the LORD thy God?
Mine eyes shall behold her:
Now shall she be trodden down as the mire of the streets.
11 In the day that thy walls are to be built,
In that day shall the decree be far removed.
12 In that day also he shall come even to thee from Assyria,
And from the fortified cities,
And from the fortress even to the river,
And from sea to sea, and from mountain to mountain.
13 Notwithstanding the land shall be desolate
Because of them that dwell therein,
For the fruit of their doings.

The prophet, having sadly complained of the wickedness of the times he lived in, here fastens upon some considerations for the comfort of himself and his friends in reference thereunto. The case is bad, but it is not desperate: "Yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing."

First. Though God be now displeased, he shall be reconciled to us, and then all will be well, ver. 7, 9. We are now under "the indignation of the Lord;" God is angry with us, and justly, because we have sinned against him. Note, It is our sin against God that provokes his indignation against us; and we must see it, and own it, whenever we are under Divine rebukes, that we may justify God, and may study to answer his end in afflicting us, by repenting of sin, and breaking off from it. Now, at such a time,

1. We must have recourse to God under our troubles; ver. 7, "Therefore I will look unto the Lord." When a child of God has ever so much occasion to cry, "Woe is me!" as the prophet here, ver. 1, yet it may be a comfort to him that he has a God to look to, a God to come to, to fly to, in whom he may rejoice and have satisfaction. All may look bright above him, when all looks black and dark about him. The prophet had been complaining that there was no comfort to be had, no confidence to be put in friends and relations on earth, and this drives him to his God: "Therefore I will look unto the Lord." The less reason we have to delight in any creature, the more reason we have to delight in God. If princes are not to be trusted, we may say, Happy is the man that has the God of Jacob for his help, and happy am I, even in the midst of my present woes, if he be my help. If men be false, this is our comfort, that God is faithful. If relations be unkind, he is and will be gracious. Let us therefore look above and beyond them, and overlook our disappointment in them, and look unto the Lord.

2. We must submit to the will of God in our troubles; "I will bear the indignation of the Lord," will bear it patiently, without murmuring and repining, "because I have sinned against him." Note, Those that are truly penitent for sin will see a great deal of reason to be patient under affliction. Wherefore should a man complain for the punishment of his sin? When we complain to God of the badness of the times we ought to complain against ourselves for the badness of our own hearts.

3. We must depend upon God to work deliverance for us, and put a good issue to our troubles in due time. We must not only look to him, but look for him: "I will wait for the God of my salvation," and for his gracious returns to me. In our greatest distresses we shall see no reason to despair of salvation, if by faith we eye God as the God of our salvation, who is able to save the weakest, upon their humble petition, and willing to save the worst, upon their true repentance. And if we depend on God as the God of our salvation, we must wait upon him, and for his salvation, in his own way and his own time. Let us now see what the church is here taught to expect and promise herself from God, even then when things are brought to the last extremity. 1st. "My God will hear me." If the Lord be our God, he will hear our prayers, and grant an answer of peace to them. 2nd. "When I fall," and am in danger of being dashed in pieces by the fall, yet "I shall arise" and recover myself again. I fall, but am not utterly cast down, Ps. xxxvii. 24. 3rd. "When I sit in darkness," desolate and disconsolate, melancholy and perplexed, and not knowing what to do, or which way to look for relief, yet then "the Lord shall be a light unto me," to comfort and revive me, to instruct and teach me, to direct and guide me, as a light to mine eyes, a light to my feet, a light in a dark place. 4th. He "will plead my cause, and execute judgment for me," ver. 9. If we heartily espouse the cause of God, the just but injured cause of religion and virtue, and make it our cause, we may hope he will own our cause, and plead it. The church's cause, though it seem for a time to go against her, yet will at length be pleaded with jealousy, and judgment not only given against, but executed upon, the enemies of it. 5th. "He will bring me forth to the light." Shall make me shine eminently out of obscurity, and become conspicuous; shall make my righteousness shine evidently from under the dark cloud of calumny, Ps. xxxvii. 6; Isa. lviii. 10; the morning of comfort shine forth out of the long and dark night of trouble. 6th. "I shall behold his righteousness;" that is, I shall see the equity of his proceedings concerning me, and the performance of his promises to me.

Secondly. Though enemies triumph and insult, they shall be silenced, and put to shame, ver. 8, 10. Observe here,

1. How proudly the enemies of God's people trample upon them in their distress. They said, "Where is the Lord their God?" As if, because they were afflicted, God had forsaken them, and they knew not where to find him with their prayers, and he knew not how to help them with his favours. This David's enemies said to him, and it was a sword in his bones, Ps. xlii. 10, and see Ps. cxv. 2. Thus, in reproaching Israel as an abandoned people, they reflected on the God of Israel as an unkind, unfaithful God.

2. How comfortably the people of God by faith bear up themselves under these insults; ver. 8, "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy;" I am now down, but shall not be always so; and when my God appears for me, then "she that is mine enemy shall see it and be ashamed," not only being disappointed in her expectations of the church's utter ruin, but having the same cup of trembling put into her hand. Then "mine eyes shall behold her" in the same deplorable condition that I now am in. "Now shall she be trodden down." Note, The deliverance of the church will be the confusion of her enemies; and their shame shall be double when, as they have trampled upon God's people, so they shall themselves be trampled upon.

Thirdly. Though the land continue a great while desolate, yet it shall at length be replenished again, when the time, even the set time of its deliverance, comes.

1. Its salvation shall not come 'till after it has been desolate,' so the margin reads it, ver. 13. God has a controversy with the land, and it must lie long under his rebukes, "because of them that dwell therein." It is their iniquity that makes their land desolate, Ps. cvii. 34; it is "for the fruit of their doings," their evil doings, which they have been themselves guilty of, and the evil fruit of them, the sins of others which they have been accessary to, by their ill influence and example. For this they must expect to smart a great while, for the world shall know that God hates sin even in his own people.

2. When it doth come it shall be a complete salvation; and it seems to refer to their deliverance out of Babylon by Cyrus, which Isaiah about this time prophesied of, as a type of our redemption by Christ. 1st. The "decree shall be far removed." God's decree concerning their captivity, and Nebuchadnezzar's decree concerning the perpetuity of it, his resolution never to release them, these shall be set aside and revoked, and you shall hear no more of them; they shall no more lie as a yoke upon thy neck. 2nd. Jerusalem and the cities of Judah shall be again reared; then "Thy walls shall be built," walls for habitation, walls for defence, house walls, town walls, temple walls. It is in order to these that the decree is repealed, Isa. xliv. 28. Though Zion's walls may lie long in ruins, there will come a day when they shall be repaired. 3rd. All that belong to the land of Israel, whithersoever dispersed, and howsoever distressed, far and wide over the face of the whole earth, shall come flocking to it again, ver. 12. He shall come even to thee, having liberty to return, and a heart to return, from Assyria, whither the ten tribes were carried away, though it lay remote; and from the fortified cities, and from the fortress, those strongholds in which they thought they had them fast; for when God's time is come, though Pharaoh will not let the people go, God will fetch them out with a high hand. They shall come from all the remote parts, from sea to sea, and from mountain to mountain, not turning back for fear of their discouragements, but they shall go from strength to strength till they come to Zion. Thus, in the great day of redemption, "God will gather his elect from the four winds."

Here is, First. The prophet's prayer to God to take care of his own people, and of their cause and interest, ver. 14. When God is about to deliver his people, he stirs up their friends to pray for them, and pours out a spirit of grace and supplication, Zec. xii. 10; and when we see God coming towards us in ways of mercy, we must go forth to meet him by prayer. It is a prophetical prayer, which amounts to a promise of the good prayed for. What God directed his prophet to ask, no doubt he designed to give. Now, 1. The people of Israel are here called the flock of God's heritage, for they are the sheep of his hand, the sheep of his pasture, his little flock in the world; and they are his heritage, his portion in the world; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. 2. This flock "dwells solitarily in the wood," or forest, "in the midst of Carmel," a high mountain. Israel was a peculiar people, that dwelt alone, and was not reckoned among the nations, like a flock of sheep in a wood. They were now a desolate people, ver. 13, were in the land of their captivity as sheep in a forest, in danger of being lost, and made a prey of to the beasts of the forest. They are scattered upon the mountains as sheep having no shepherd. 3. He prays that God would "feed them there with his rod;" that is, that he would take care of them in their captivity, would protect them, and provide for them, and do the part of a good shepherd to them. Let thy rod and staff comfort them, even in that darksome valley; and even there let them want nothing that is good for them. Let them be governed by thy rod, not the rod of their enemies, for they are thy people. 4. He prays that God would in due time bring them back to feed in the plains of Bashan and Gilead, and no longer to be fed in the woods and mountains. Let them feed in their own country again, as in the days of old. Some apply this spiritually, and make it either the prophet's prayer to Christ or his Father's charge to him to take care of his church, as the great Shepherd of the sheep; and to go in and out before them while they are here in this world, as in a wood, that they may find pasture, as in Carmel, as in Bashan and Gilead.

Secondly. God's promise in answer to this prayer. And we may well take God's promises as real answers to the prayers of faith, and embrace them accordingly, for with him saying and doing are not two things. The prophet prayed that God would feed them, and do kind things for them; but God answers that he will shew them marvellous things, ver. 15, will do for them more than they are able to ask or think, will outdo their hopes and expectations; he will shew them his marvellous loving-kindness, Ps. xvii. 2. 1. He will do that for them which shall be the repetition of the wonders and miracles of former ages; "according to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt." Their deliverance out of Babylon shall be a work of wonder and grace, not inferior to their deliverance out of Egypt, nay, it should eclipse the lustre of that, Jer. xvi. 14, 15, much more should the work of redemption by Christ be so. Note, God's former favours to his church are patterns of future favours, and shall again be copied out as there is occasion. 2. He will do that for them which shall be matter of wonder and amazement to the present age, ver. 16, 17. The nations about shall take notice of it, and it shall be said among the heathen, "The Lord has done great things for them," Ps. cxxvi. 2. The impression which the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon shall make upon the neighbour nations shall be very much for the honour both of God and his church. 1st. Those that had insulted over the people of God in their distress, and gloried that when they had them down they would keep them down, shall be confounded when they see them surprisingly rising up; they shall be confounded at all the might with which the captives shall now exert themselves, whom they thought for ever disabled. They shall now "lay their hands upon their mouth," as being ashamed of what they have said, and not able to say any more, by way of triumph over Israel. Nay, "their ears shall be deaf" too, so much shall they be ashamed at the wonderful deliverance; they shall stop their ears, as being not willing to hear any more of God's wonders wrought for that people which they had so despised and insulted over. 2nd. Those that had impudently confronted God himself shall now be struck with a fear of him, and thereby brought, in profession at least, to submit to him; ver. 17, "They shall lick the dust like a serpent," they shall be so mortified, as if they were sentenced to the same curse the serpent was laid under; Gen. iii. 14, "Upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat." They shall be brought to the lowest abasement imaginable, and shall be so dispirited that they shall tamely submit to them. "His enemies shall lick the dust," Ps. xii. 9. Nay, they shall lick the dust of the church's feet, Isa. xlix. 23. Proud oppressors shall now be made sensible how mean, how little, they are before the great God, and they shall, with trembling, and the lowest submission, "move out of the holes," into which they are crept, Isa. ii. 21, "like worms of the earth" as they are, being ashamed and afraid to shew their heads; so low shall they be brought, and such abjects shall they be when they are abased. When God did wonders for his church, many of the people of the land became Jews, because the fear of the Jews and of their God fell upon them, Est. viii. 17. So it is promised here, "They shall be afraid of the Lord our God, and shall fear because of thee," O Israel. Forced submissions are often but feigned submissions, yet they redound to the glory of God and the church, though not to the benefit of the dissemblers themselves.

Thirdly. The prophet's thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy, in the name of the church, with a believing dependence upon his promise, ver. 11, 19, 20. We are here taught,

1. To give to God the glory of his pardoning mercy, ver. 18. God having promised to bring back the captivity of his people, the prophet on that occasion admires pardoning mercy, as that which was the bottom of it. As it was their sin that brought them into bondage, so it was God's pardoning their sin that brought them out of it: see Ps. lxxxv. 1, 2; Isa. xxxiii. 24; xxxviii. 17; xl. 1, 2. The pardon of sin is the foundation of all other covenant mercies, Heb. viii. 12. This the prophet stands amazed at, while the nations about only stood amazed at those deliverances which were but the fruits of this. Note, 1st. God's people, that are the remnant of his heritage, stand charged with many transgressions. Being but a remnant, a very few, one would hope they should all be very good, but they are not so, God's children have their spots, and oft offend their Father. 2nd. The gracious God is ready to pass by and pardon the iniquity and transgression of his people upon their repentance and return to him. God's people are pardoned people, and to this they owe their all. When God pardons sin he passeth it by, doth not punish it as justly he might, nor deal with the sinner according to the desert of it. 3rd. Though God may for a time lay his own people under the tokens of his displeasure, yet he will not retain his anger for ever; but though he cause grief he will have compassion. He is not implacable, yet against those that are not of the remnant of his heritage, that are unpardoned, he will keep his anger for ever. 4th. The reasons why God pardons sin and keeps not his anger for ever are all taken from within himself; it is "because he delights in mercy," and the salvation of sinners is what he has pleasure in, not their death and damnation. 5th. The glory of God in forgiving sin is, as in other things, matchless, and without compare. There is no God like unto him for this; no magistrate, no common person, forgives as God doth. In this his thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours; in this he is God, and not man. 6th. All those that have experienced pardoning mercy cannot but admire that mercy; it is what we have reason to stand amazed at, if we know what it is. Has God forgiven us our transgressions? We may well say, "Who is a God like unto thee?" Our holy wonder of pardoning mercy will be a good evidence of our interest in it.

2. To take to ourselves the comfort of that mercy, and all that grace and truth that goes along with it. God's people here, as they look back with thankfulness upon God's pardoning their sins, so they look forward with assurance upon what he would yet farther do for them. His mercy endures for ever; and therefore, as he has shewed mercy, so he will, ver. 19, 20. 1st. He will renew his favours to us. "He will turn again," he will "have compassion;" he will again have compassion upon us, as formerly he had. His compassions shall be new every morning; he seemed to be departing from us in anger, but he will turn again and pity us. He will turn us to himself, and then will turn to us and have mercy upon us. 2nd. He will renew us, to prepare and qualify us for his favour. "He will subdue our iniquities;" when he takes away the guilt of sin, that it may not damn us, he will break the power of sin, that it may not have dominion over us; that we may not fear sin, or be led captive by it. Sin is an enemy that fights against us, a tyrant that oppresseth us; nothing less than almighty grace can subdue it, so great is its power in fallen man, and so long has it kept possession. But if God forgive the sin that has been committed by us, he will subdue the sin that dwelleth in us, and in that there is none like him in forgiving. And all those whose sins are pardoned earnestly desire and hope to have their corruptions mortified, and their iniquities subdued, and please themselves with the hopes of it. If we be left to ourselves our iniquities will be too hard for us, but God's grace we trust shall be sufficient for us to subdue them, so that they shall not rule us, and then they shall not ruin us. 3rd. He will confirm this good work, and effectually provide that his act of grace shall never be repealed. "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depth of the sea," as when he brought them out of Egypt (to which he has an eye in the promises here, ver. 15,) he subdued Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and cast them "into the depth of the sea." It intimates that when God forgives sin he remembers it no more, and takes care that it shall never be remembered more against the sinner; Eze. xviii. 22, "His transgressions shall not be mentioned unto him;" they are blotted out as a cloud which never appears more. He casts them into the sea, not near the shore side, where they may appear again next low water, but into the depth of the sea, never to rise again. All their sins shall he cast there without exception, for when God forgives sin he forgives all. 4th. He will perfect that which concerns us, and with this good work will do all that for us which our case requires, and which he has promised; ver. 20, Then "thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham." It is in pursuance of the covenant that our sins are pardoned and our lusts mortified; from that spring all these streams flow, and with these he shall freely give us all things. The promise is said to be mercy to Abraham, because, as made to him first, it was mere mercy, preventing mercy, considering what state it found in him. But it was truth to Jacob, because the faithfulness of God was engaged to make good to him and his seed, as heirs to Abraham, all that was graciously promised to Abraham. See here, First. With what solemnity the covenant of grace is ratified to us. It was not only spoken, written, and sealed, but, which is the highest confirmation, it was sworn to our fathers. Nor is it a modern project, but is confirmed by antiquity too: it was sworn from the days of old; it is an ancient charter. Secondly. With what satisfaction it may be applied and relied upon by us. We may say with the highest assurance, Thou wilt perform the truth and mercy; not one iota or tittle of it shall fall to the ground; faithful is he that has promised, who also will do it.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF MICAH.

CHAP. I.—6. I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard: and I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations thereof. 'We read over the prophecy of Micah regarding Samaria as we drew near to it, and conversed together as to its full meaning. We asked Dr. Keith what he understood by the expression, "I will make Samaria as a heap of the field?" He replied that he supposed that the ancient stones of Samaria would be found, not in the form of a ruin, but gathered into heaps in the same manner as they do in clearing a vineyard, or as our farmers at home clear their fields by gathering the stones together. In a little after we found the conjecture to be completely verified.' Having described their investigation of the ruined city, the writers (M'Cheyne and Bonar) continue: 'It was most affecting to look round this scene of desolation, and to remember that this was the place where wicked Ahab built his house of Baal, where cruel Jezebel ruled, and where Elijah and Elisha did their wonders. But, above all, it filled the mind with solemn awe to read over on the spot the words of God's prophet uttered 2500 years before—"I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard: and I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations thereof." Every clause reveals a new feature in the desolation of Samaria, differing in all its details from the desolation of Jerusalem, and every word has literally come to pass. We had found, both on the summit and on the southern valley, at every little interval, heaps of ancient stones piled up which had been gathered off the surface to clear it for cultivation. There can be no doubt that these stones once formed part of the temples, and palaces, and dwellings of Samaria, so that the word is fulfilled, "I will make Samaria as a heap of the field." We had also seen how completely the hill had been cleared of all its edifices, the stones gathered off it as in the clearing of a vineyard, the only columns that remain standing bare, without their capitals; so that, in all respects, the hill is left like "the plantings of a vineyard;" either like the bare vine-shoots of a newly-planted vineyard, or like the well-cleared terraces where vines might be advantageously planted. Still farther we had seen that the ruins of the ancient city had not been left to moulder away on the hill where they were built, as is the case with other ruined cities, but had been cleared away to make room for the labours of the husbandman. The place where the buildings of the city stood had been tilled, sown, and reaped, and the buildings themselves rolled down over the brow of the hill. Of this, the heaps in the valley, the loose fragments in the rude dykes that run up the sides, and the broken columns on their way down into the valley, are witnesses; so that the destroyers of Samaria (whose very name is unknown,) and the simple husbandman have both unwittingly been fulfilling God's word, "I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley." And, last of all, we had noticed that many of the stones in the valley were large and massy, as if they had been foundation stones of a building, and that in many parts of the vast colonnade nothing more than the bases of the pillars remain. But especially, we observed that the ruined church had been built upon foundations of a far older date than the church itself, the stones being of great size, and bevelled in a manner similar to the stones of the temple wall at Jerusalem, and those of the mosque at Hebron; and these foundations were now quite exposed. So that the last clause of the prophecy is fulfilled with the same awful minuteness, "I will discover the foundations thereof." Surely there is more than enough in the fulfilment of this fourfold prediction to condemn, if it does not convince, the infidel.'—Narrative. 16. Make thee bald. The prophet concludes this geographical part of his denunciations by addressing himself to the land of Judah, and calling upon her to put on signs of deep-felt grief on account of the removal of her inhabitants. Baldness, and cutting off the beard, are tokens of mourning in the East, as they were among the nations of antiquity, Ezr. ix. 3; Job. i. 20; Jer. vii. 21; xvi. 6; xlviii. 37. 'When Khaled ben Walid ben Mogairah died, there was not a female of the house of Mogairah, either matron or maiden, who caused not her hair to be cut off at his funeral.'—Harmer's Observ. iii. p. 5. One species of eagle is called the bald eagle, from the circumstance of its having its head almost entirely bald; but they all, more or less, exhibit baldness during the moulting season.—H.

CHAP. II.—12, 13. These verses are translated as follows by Hengstenberg, whose comment we subjoin: 'I will collect, yea, O Jacob, I will collect thee wholly, I will collect the remnant of Israel. Together will I bring them as the sheep of Bozrah, as a flock upon their pasture, they shall make a tumult before men. The breaker goes forth before them, they break through, pass through the gate, and go forth, and their king marches before them, and the Lord in their front.' The whole description receives much light from the remark that its lines are nearly all borrowed from the deliverance out of Egypt. Israel there, under oppression and affliction, constantly increased in numbers by the Lord's blessing concealed under the cross; compare Ex. i. 12. When the time of redemption came, the Lord, who had long remained concealed, again made himself known as their God; in the first place, the people were collected,—then the Lord marched before them in a pillar of cloud by day, and in a pillar of fire by night He led them out of Egypt, the house of bondmen. Just so here also. The increase and assembling are described in the twelfth verse, the deliverance in the thirteenth; here, as there, Israel's affliction is exhibited under the image of a residence in the house of bondage, a prison whose gates the Lord opens, whose walls he breaks through. In this leaning to the former deliverance, which has its deeper ground in the typical import of the latter, an aeted prediction of all later deliverances, and which fully contains in itself their germ and their pledge, Micah harmonizes with his contemporaries, Hosea and Isaiah; compare Hos. ii. 1, 2; Isa. xi. 11—16.—The words, 'together will I bring,' &c., shew, at the same time, the faithfulness of the great Shepherd, who collects his scattered flock out of all regions, and the unexpected and wonderful increase of this flock? Compare Jer. xxiii. 3; xxxi. 10. We take Bozrah as the name of the capital of the Idumeans in Auranitis, four days' journey from Damascus.—Supplementary Note to Isa. xxxiv. The great wealth of this city in herds appears from Isa. xxxiv. 6, and may be easily explained by its position. In its neighbourhood, particularly, begins the immeasurable Arabian plain, which extends on the one side without interruption to Dschof in the heart of Arabia, and reaches northwards, under the name of El Hamad, to Bagdad. Its length and breadth are reckoned at eight days' journey. It contains an abundance of flowering plants.—The tertium comparationis is to be sought in the assembling, in antithesis with the dispersion. The multitude comes under consideration here only as a necessary consequence of the collection. We must think of the flocks of Bozrah as being not merely numerous, but at the same time as crowded together.—The last words graphically describe the tumult which a numerous and crowded flock occasions. The whole verse (13) is to be explained by the figure, lying at the foundation of a prison, in which the people of God are shut up, but are now to be delivered by the powerful hand of God. By the breaker through we understand the dux et antesignanus raised up by God. Every Divine deliverance begins with the raising up and preparing of such a leader; and what the typical leader, a Moses, a Zerubbabel, was in the inferior deliverances, that was Christ in the highest and last. The three verbs, they 'break through,' they 'pass through,' they 'go forth,' vividly describe the progress which can be hindered by no human power.—The last words give a view of the highest leader of the expedition: compare besides Ex. xiii. 21; Isa. lii. 12; xl. 11; Ps. lxxx. 3. In the exodus from Egypt, besides Moses, (the breaker through,) there went before the host a visible symbol of God's presence. On the return from Babylon the angel of the Lord was visible only to the eye of faith, as formerly, when Abraham's servant journeyed to Mesopotamia, Gen. xxiv. 7. In the last and highest deliverance the breaker through was at the same time the King and God of the people.—The Christology of the Old Testament, by E. W. Hengstenberg, translated by Dr. Reuel Keith, Rev. T. K. Arnold's edition.

CHAP. III.—3. Flay their skin from off them. The metaphor of a flock is still carried on. The chiefs of Jacob and the princes of Israel, instead of taking care of the flocks, defending them, and finding them pasture, oppressed them in various ways. Suetonius tells us, in his life of Tiberius, that when the governors of the provinces wrote to the emperor, entreating him to increase the tributes, he wrote back, 'It is the property of a good shepherd to shear his sheep, not to skin them,'—a maxim which many rulers of the earth do not seem to understand.—A. Clarke. 12. Therefore shall Zion—be ploughed as a field. It shall undergo, says the same commentator, a variety of reverses and sackages, till at last there shall not be one stone left on the top of another that shall not be pulled down, and then a plough shall be drawn along the site of the valley. Of this ancient custom Horace speaks,

> From hence proud cities date their utter falls,
> When, insolent in ruin, o'er their walls
> The wrathful soldier drags the hostile plough,
> That haughty mark of total overthrow.

The destruction of the city and temple by the Romans, as well as that by the Chaldeans, seems to have been predicted, in which the ground where the temple stood is said to have been broken up with a plough by the conqueror. Supplementary Note to Luke xix. 41—44.

CHAP. IV.—1. But in the last days it shall come to pass. Supplementary Note, Isa. ii. 4. They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree. This beautiful addition, which is not in Isaiah, appears to have been a common adage among the Hebrews, to express a state of complete outward security, 1 Kin. iv. 25; Zec. iii. 10. 'In the court and the house in which we were lodged, (at Hasbeuja, near the source of the Jordan,) and in many similar places of the town, we noticed vines and fig-trees spreading their tendrils and umbrageous branches. The rearing of these plants in this manner is now commencing in Lebanon and Damascus, and doubtless is of great antiquity in the country.'—Lands of the Bible. And none shall make them afraid. Regarding this passage as prophesying the conversion not only of the Gentiles, but also of the Jews, and the state of peace to which they would in the latter times be brought, no images could be employed more strikingly descriptive than those employed in this verse, of the greatness and blessedness of the change, especially when contrasted with the present condition of the Israelites in many parts of the world, where they live in such insecurity and fear. See Supplementary Note, Deu. xxviii. 24, for proofs of this as to their past state; and in evidence of their present condition, especially in different parts of the Continent, we add the words of a converted Jew, now an esteemed minister of the Gospel: 'They are,' says Mr. Herschell, 'driven from place to place, and not permitted to live in the same street where the (so-called) Christians reside! It not unfrequently happens that when one or more wealthy Jews have built commodious houses in any part of a town not hitherto prohibited, this affords a reason for proscribing them; it is immediately enacted that no Jew must live in that part of the city, and they are forthwith driven from their houses, without any compensation for their loss being given them. They are oppressed on every side, yet dare not complain; robbed and defrauded, yet obtain no redress; in the walks of social life insult and contempt meet them at every turning.' Nowhere are they more illiberally and cruelly treated than in the free towns of Germany. 'At this moment the Jews in Hamburgh are subject to their former degrading thraldom; they are still in the land of Egyptian bondage; still made to endure the feelings of an outcast race.' 5. For all people will walk every one in the name of his God. Many interpreters have been puzzled how to reconcile the statement made in the beginning of this verse with the prediction contained in verse 2. The difficulty will be removed if we consider the words to be those of the Jews during their dispersion. 'Hic spectanda est diversitas temporis,'—Calvin, in loc. They witnessed the eagerness with which the idolaters around them devoted themselves to the service of their gods—an eagerness which led them to despair of their ever being reclaimed; and they nobly resolved that nothing should ever again move them to abandon the service of Jehovah; but that, with equal earnestness, they would addict themselves to his worship, and the observance of his laws.—H.

CHAP. V.—2. Beth-lehem Ephratah. Supplementary Note to Mat. ii. 6. Michaelis remarks, 'If not even a word were found in Mat. ii. 5, 6, explanatory of our text, I should believe the subject to be Christ, who was born in the reign of Herod. The whole thread of the prophecy in the preceding chapter leads me to him, and the time of his birth.' The Messianic application of the prophecy was formally made by the Jewish Sanhedrim, in their official reply to Herod, Mat. ii. 5, 6; and is admitted both by the rabbinical and the rationalistic interpreters, though, as might be expected, they differ as to the person of the Messiah. The Targum has, 'From thee the Messiah shall come forth before me, to exercise dominion over Israel, whose name was announced long ago, from the days of old.' 5. And this man shall be the peace. 'And This Same shall be the peace,' are intimately connected with the preceding words, but have no relation to those which follow, except in so far as the victories there assumed were to pave the way for that state of the Jewish affairs during which the Messiah was to appear in the world. 'This, This Same,' is used emphatically, with reference to the Messiah, who had just been spoken of. Compare, for a similar use of the pronoun, Gen. v. 29; Ex. xv. 2; "peace" is put, by metonymy, for the author and introducer of reconciliation; compare Gen. xlix. 10; Isa. ix. 5; Zec. ix. 10; Eph. ii. 14, 17; Col. i. 20.—H. The following is Dr. Hale's translation of verses 3, 4, and part of 5:

> 'Therefore he will give them up (for a season)
> Until the time that she which shall bear
> Have borne: then shall return
> The residue of thy brethren (the Jews),
> Along with the outcasts of Israel.
> And he shall stand and guide them
> In the strength of THE LORD,
> In the majesty of THE NAME OF THE LORD HIS GOD.
> And when they return, He shall be magnified
> Unto the ends of the earth,
> And He shall be their PEACE.—Analysis, ii. 462.

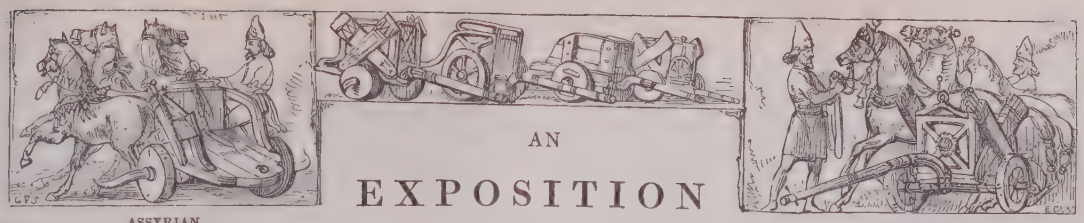
6. Thus shall he deliver us from the Assyrian. This promised Saviour, and salvation, would ensure to Judah peace, or deliverance, during the ravages of the Assyrians and other enemies. But, as Sennacherib's invasion was not repelled by the ruler or chieftains of Israel,—nor did the Jews ever invade or waste the Assyrian dominions, or those of the Chaldeans, who afterwards occupied the same regions,—it seems evident that these expressions must be understood as mystically intending other enemies and persecutors of the church, who should be of the same spirit with Sennacherib and the Assyrians. Whatever heathen, infidel, or antichristian opposers should at any time harass, or attempt to desolate, the church, as Sennacherib did Judah and Jerusalem, the great Shepherd of the flock would furnish a competent number of able teachers and rulers, to defeat their designs, and at length to retaliate upon them, and to destroy those who had attempted to destroy them. This may refer to the powerful effects of the preached Gospel in the primitive times, in subverting paganism; to the termination of pagan persecution, by the conversion of the Roman emperors; and to the future promulgation of the Gospel, and the ruin of all antichristian, pagan, and Mohammedan powers, by the numerous and able instruments whom the Lord will raise up for these purposes.

CHAP. VII.—18. Who is a God like unto thee? Impelled by strong feelings of gratitude at the anticipated deliverance of his people, the prophet breaks out into a strain of the sublimest praise and admiration, and gives a description of the gracious character of God, unrivalled by any contained in the Scriptures.—H. 20. Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob. This promise, and this oath, says Dr. Clarke, God has most signally fulfilled by the incarnation of Christ, who was sent to bless us by turning away every one of us from his iniquities; and for this purpose he was delivered for our offences, and rose again for our justification; and repentance and remission of sins are preached in his name to all nations. The proclamation was first made at Jerusalem; and that the prophet refers to this is evident from the use made of these words by Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, when, under the full afflatus of the Spirit of God, he quoted this prophecy of Micah, as fulfilled in the incarnation of Christ, Lu. i. 72, 73. Well might the prophet exult in his challenge to earth and hell. "Who is a God like unto thee!" Hell is speechless, earth is dumb. Infidels dare not open their mouths!!! Hallelujah! Jesus is the mighty God and Saviour, pardoning iniquity, transgression, and sin, and saving to the uttermost all that come unto God through him. Blessed be God! Reader, lay this to heart.



ASSYRIAN CHARIOTS.

AN

EXPOSITION

OF THE

PROPHECY OF NAHUM,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE name of this prophet signifies 'a comforter;' for it was a charge given to all the prophets, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people;" and even this prophet, though wholly taken up in foretelling the destruction of Nineveh, which speaks terror to the Assyrians, yet even in that is comforter to the ten tribes of Israel, who it is probable were now lately carried captives into Assyria. It is very uncertain at what time he lived and prophesied, but most probable that he lived in the time of Hezekiah, and prophesied against Nineveh after the captivity of Israel by the king of Assyria, which was in the ninth year of Hezekiah, and before Sennacherib's invading Judah, which was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah; for to that attempt, and the defeat of it, it is supposed the first chapter has reference, and it is probable was delivered a little before it, for the encouragement of God's people, in that day of treading down and perplexity. And it is the conjecture of the learned Huetius that the two other chapters of this book were delivered by Nahum some years after, perhaps in the reign of Manasseh, and in that reign the Jewish chronologies generally place him, somewhat nearer to the time when Nineveh was conquered, and the Assyrian monarchy reduced by Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar, some time before the first captivity of Judah. It is probable Nahum did by word of mouth prophesy many things concerning Israel and Judah, as it is certain Jonah did, 2 Kin. xiv. 25, though we have nothing of either of them in writing but what related to Nineveh; which, though a great and ancient city, yet probably we should never have heard of in sacred writ, if the Israel of God had not had some concern in it.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The inscription of the book, ver. 1. II. A magnificent display of the glory of God, in a mixture of wrath and justice against the wicked, and mercy and grace towards his people, and the discovery of his majesty and power in both, ver. 2—8. III. A particular application of this (as most interpreters think) to the destruction of Sennacherib and the Assyrian army when they besieged Jerusalem, which was a very memorable and illustrious instance of the power both of God's justice and of his mercy, and spoke abundance of terror to his enemies and encouragement to his faithful servants, ver. 9—16.

THE burden of Nineveh. The book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite.

This title directs us to consider,

First. The great city against which the word of the Lord is here delivered; it is "the burden of Nineveh." Not only a prophecy and a weighty one, but a burdensome prophecy, a dead weight to Nineveh, a millstone hanged about its neck. Nineveh was the place concerned, and the Assyrian monarchy, which that was the royal seat of. About a hundred years before this Jonah had, in God's name, foretold the speedy overthrow of this great city; but then the Ninevites repented and were spared, and that decree did not bring forth. The Ninevites then saw clearly how much it was to their advantage to turn from their evil way; it was the saving of their city; and yet soon after they returned to it again. It became worse than ever, a bloody city, and full of lies and robbery; they repented of their repentance, returned with the dog to his vomit, and at length grew worse than ever they had been. Then God sent not this prophet, as Jonah, but this prophecy, to read them their doom, which was now irreversible. Note, The reprieve will not be continued if the repentance be not continued in. If men turn from the good they began to do, they can expect no other but that God should turn from the favour he began to shew, Jer. xviii. 10.

Secondly. The poor prophet, by whom the word of the Lord is here delivered; it is "the book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite." The burthen of Nineveh was what the prophet plainly foresaw, for it was his vision, and what he left upon record; it is the "book of the vision," that when he was gone the event might be compared with the prediction, and confirm it. All the account we have of the prophet himself is, that he was an Elkoshite, of the town called Elkes, or Elcos, which St. Jerome saith was in Galilee. Some observe that the Scripture ordinarily saith little of the prophets themselves, that our faith might not stand upon their authority, but upon that of the blessed Spirit by whom their prophecies were indited.

2 God is jealous, and the LORD revengeth;
The LORD revengeth, and is furious;
The LORD will take vengeance on his adversaries,
And he reserveth wrath for his enemies.
3 The LORD is slow to anger, and great in power,
And will not at all acquit the wicked:
The LORD hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm,
And the clouds are the dust of his feet.
4 He rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry,
And drieth up all the rivers:
Bashan languisheth, and Carmel,
And the flower of Lebanon languisheth.
5 The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt,
And the earth is burned at his presence,
Yea, the world, and all that dwell therein.
6 Who can stand before his indignation?
And who can abide in the fierceness of his anger?
His fury is poured out like fire,
And the rocks are thrown down by him.
7 The LORD is good, a strong hold in the day of trouble;
And he knoweth them that trust in him.
8 But with an overrunning flood
He will make an utter end of the place thereof,
And darkness shall pursue his enemies.

Nineveh knows not God, that God that contends with her, and therefore is here told what a God he is; and it is good for us all to mix faith with that which is here said concerning him, which speaks a great deal of terror to the wicked and comfort to good people; for this glorious description of the Sovereign of the world, like the pillar of cloud and fire, has a bright side towards Israel and a dark side towards the Egyptians. Let each take their portion from it; let sinners read it and tremble; let saints read it and triumph. The wrath of God is here revealed from heaven against his enemies; his favour and mercy is here assured to his faithful loyal subjects, and his almighty power in both, making his wrath very terrible and his favour very desirable.

First. He is a God of inflexible justice, a jealous God, and will take vengeance on his enemies; let Nineveh know this, and tremble before him. Their idols are insignificant things, there is nothing formidable in them, but the God of Israel is greatly to be feared. For,

1. He resents the affronts and indignities done him by those that deny his being, or any of his perfections, that set up other gods in competition with him, that destroy his laws, arraign his proceedings, ridicule his word, or are abusive to his people. Let such know that Jehovah, the one only living and true God, is a jealous God, and a revenger. He is jealous for his own honour in the matters of his worship, and will not endure a rival. He is jealous for the comfort of his worshippers, jealous for his land, Joel ii. 18, and will not have that injured. He is a revenger, and he is furious; he hath fury, so the word is; not as man hath it, in whom it is an ungoverned passion, so he hath said, "Fury is not in me," Isa. xxvii. 4; but he has it in such a way as becomes the righteous God, to put an edge upon his justice, and to make it appear more terrible to those who otherwise would stand in no awe of it. He is 'Lord of anger,' so the Hebrew phrase is for that which we read, he is furious; he hath anger, but he hath it at command, and under government. Our anger is often lord over us, as theirs that have no rule over their own spirits, but God is always Lord of his anger, and weigheth a path to it, Ps. lxxviii. 50.

2. He resolved to reckon with those that put those affronts upon him. We are told here, not only that he is a revenger, but that he will take vengeance; he hath said he will, he hath sworn it, Deu. xxxii. 40, 41. Whoever are his adversaries and enemies among men, he will make them feel his resentments; and though the sentence against his enemies is not executed speedily, yet he reserveth wrath for them, and reserveth them for it, in the day of wrath. Against his own people, that repent and humble themselves before him, he keepeth not his anger for ever, but against his enemies he will for ever let out his anger. And, ver. 3, he "will not at all acquit the wicked," that sin and stand to it, and do not repent. Those wickedly depart from their God that depart and never return, Ps. xviii. 21, and these he will not acquit. Humble supplicants will find him gracious, but scornful beggars will not find him easy, or that the door of mercy will be opened to a loud but late "Lord, Lord." This revelation of the wrath of God against his enemies is applied to Nineveh, ver. 8, and should be applied by all those to themselves who go on still in their trespasses: "With an overrunning flood he will make an utter end of the places thereof;" the army of the Chaldeans shall overrun the country of the Assyrians, and lay it all waste. God's judgments, when they come with commission, are like a deluge to any people, which they cannot keep off or make head against. Darkness shall pursue his enemies, terror and trouble shall follow them whithersoever they go, shall pursue them to utter darkness. If they think to flee from the darkness that pursues them, they will but fall into that which is before them.

Secondly. He is a God of irresistible power, and is able to deal with his enemies, be they never so many, never so mighty, never so hardy. He is "great in power," ver. 3, and therefore it is good having him our friend, and bad having him our enemy. Now here,

1. The power of God is asserted and proved by divers instances of it in the kingdom of nature, where we always find its visible effects in the ordinary course of nature, and sometimes in the surprising alterations of that course. 1st. If we look up into the regions of the air, there we shall find proofs of his power, for "he hath his ways in the whirlwind and the storm;" which way soever God goes he carries a whirlwind and storm along with him for the terror of his enemies, Ps. xviii. 9, &c.; and wherever there is a whirlwind and a storm, God has the command of it, the control of it, makes his way through it, goes on his way in it, and serves his own purposes by it. He spoke to Job out of the whirlwind, and even stormy winds fulfil his word. He has "his way in the whirlwind," that is, he goes on undiscerned, and the methods of his providence are to us unaccountable, as it is said, "His way is in the sea." "The clouds are the dust of his feet," that is, he treads on them, walks on them, raiseth them when he pleaseth, as a man with his feet raiseth a cloud of dust. It is but by permission, or usurpation rather, that the devil is the prince of the power of the air, for that power is in God's hand. 2nd. If we cast our eye upon the great deeps, there we find that the sea is his, for he made it; for when he pleaseth "he rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry," by drying up all the rivers with which it is continually supplied. He gave those proofs of his power when he divided the Red Sea and Jordan, and can do the same again whenever he pleaseth. 3rd. If we look around us on this earth, we find proofs of his power, when, either by the extreme heat and drought of summer or the cold and frost of winter, "Bashan languisheth, and Carmel, and the flower of Lebanon languisheth," the choicest and strongest flower languisheth. His power is often seen in earthquakes which shake the mountains, ver. 5, melt the hills, and melt them down, and level them with the plains. When he pleaseth, the earth is burnt at his presence, by the scorching heat of the sun, and he could burn it with fire from heaven, as he did Sodom; and at the end of time he will burn the world, "and all that dwell therein," the earth and all the works that are therein shall be burned up. Thus great is our Lord, and of great power.

2. This is particularly applied to his anger. If God be an almighty God, we may from thence infer, ver. 6, "Who can stand before his indignation?" The Ninevites had once found God "slow to anger," as he saith, ver. 3, and perhaps presumed upon the mercy they then had experience of, and thought they might make bold with him; but they will find he is just and jealous, as well as merciful and gracious; and having shewed the justice of his wrath, in the next he shews the power of it, and the utter insufficiency of his enemies to contend with him. It is in vain for the stoutest and strongest of sinners to think to make their part good against the power of God's anger. 1st. See God here as a consuming fire, terrible and mighty. Here is his indignation against sin, and the fierceness of his anger, his fury poured out, not like water, but like fire, like the fire and brimstone rained on Sodom, Ps. xi. 6. Hell is the fierceness of God's anger, Rev. xvi. 19. God's anger is so fierce that it beats down all before it, "the rocks are thrown down by him," that seemed immoveable. Rocks have sometimes been rent by the eruption of subterraneous fires, which is a faint resemblance of the fierceness of God's anger against sinners whose hearts are rocky, for none ever hardened their hearts against him and prospered. 2nd. See sinners here as stubble before the fire, weak and impotent, and a very unequal match for the wrath of God. First. They are utterly unable to bear up against it, so as to resist it, and put by the strokes of it. "Who can stand before his indignation?" Not the proudest and most daring sinner, not the world of the ungodly, no, not the angels that sinned. Secondly. They are utterly unable to bear up under it, so as to keep up their spirits, and preserve any enjoyment of themselves. "Who can abide in the fierceness of his anger?" As it is irresistible, so it is intolerable. Some of the effects of God's displeasure in this world a man may bear up under, but the fierceness of his anger, when it fastens immediately upon the soul, who can bear it? Let us therefore fear before him, let us stand in awe, and not sin.

Thirdly. He is a God of infinite mercy; and in the midst of all this wrath mercy is remembered. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid that go on still in their transgressions, but let not those that trust in God tremble before him. For, 1. He is slow to anger, ver. 3; not easily provoked, but ready to shew mercy to those who have offended him, and to receive them into favour upon their repentance. 2. When the tokens of his rage against the wicked are abroad, he takes care for the safety and comfort of his own people; ver. 7, "The Lord is good" to those that are good, and to them he will be "a stronghold in the day of trouble." Note. The same almighty power that is exerted for the terror and destruction of the wicked is engaged, and shall be employed, for the protection and satisfaction of his own people; he is able both to save and to destroy. In the day of public trouble, when God's judgments are in the earth laying all waste, he will be a place of defence to those who by faith put themselves under his protection, those that trust in him in the way of their duty, that live a life of dependence upon him and devotedness to him; he knows them, he owns them for his, he takes cognizance of their case, knows what is best for them, and what course to take most effectually for their relief. They are perhaps obscure and little regarded in the world, but the Lord knows them, Ps. i. 6.

9 What do ye imagine against the LORD?
He will make an utter end:
Affliction shall not rise up the second time.
10 For while they be folden together as thorns,
And while they are drunken as drunkards,
They shall be devoured as stubble fully dry.
11 There is one come out of thee,
That imagineth evil against the LORD,
A wicked counsellor.
12 Thus saith the LORD;
Though they be quiet, and likewise many,
Yet thus shall they be cut down, when he shall pass through.
Though I have afflicted thee,
I will afflict thee no more.
13 For now will I break his yoke from off thee,
And will burst thy bonds in sunder.
14 And the LORD hath given a commandment concerning thee,
That no more of thy name be sown:
Out of the house of thy gods will I cut off
The graven image and the molten image:
I will make thy grave; for thou art vile.
15 Behold upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace!
O Judah, keep thy solemn feasts, perform thy vows:
For the wicked shall no more pass through thee; he is utterly cut off.

These verses seem to point at the destruction of the army of the Assyrians under Sennacherib, which may well be reckoned a part of the burden of Nineveh, the head city of the Assyrian empire, and a pledge of the destruction of Nineveh itself about a hundred years after; and this was an event which Isaiah, with whom probably this prophet was contemporary, spoke much of. Now observe here,

First. The great provocation which the Assyrians gave to God, the just and jealous God, for which, though slow to anger, he would take vengeance; ver. 11, "There is one come out of thee, that imagineth evil against the Lord;" Sennacherib, and his spokesman Rabshakeh. They framed an evil letter and an evil speech, not only against Hezekiah and his people, but against God himself, reflecting upon him as level with the gods of the heathen, and unable to protect his worshippers, dissuading his people from putting a confidence in him, and urging them rather to put themselves under the protection of the great king, the king of Assyria; they contrived to alter the property of Jerusalem, that it should be no longer the city of the Lord, the holy city. This one, this mighty one, so he thinks himself, that comes out of Nineveh, imagining evil against the Lord, brings upon Nineveh this burden. Never was the glorious majesty of heaven and earth more daringly, more blasphemously affronted, than by Sennacherib at that time. He was "a wicked counsellor" who counselled them to despair of God's protection, and surrender themselves to the king of Assyria, and endeavoured to put them out of conceit with Hezekiah's reformation, Isa. xxxvi. 7. With this wicked counsellor he here expostulates; ver. 9, "What do ye imagine against the Lord?" What a foolish, wicked thing is it for you to plot against God, as if you could outwit Divine wisdom, and overpower Omnipotence itself. Note, There is a great deal imagined against the Lord by the gates of hell, and against the interests of his kingdom in the world, but it will prove a vain thing, Ps. ii. 1, 2. He that sits in heaven laughs at the imaginations of the pretenders to politics against him, and will turn their counsels headlong.

Secondly. The great destruction which God would bring upon them for it; not presently, upon the whole monarchy, the ruin of that was deferred till the measure of their iniquity was full, but,

1. Upon the army. God will make an utter end of that, it shall be totally cut off and ruined at one blow, one fatal stroke of the destroying angel shall lay them dead upon the spot; "Affliction shall not rise up the second time," for it shall not need. With some sinners God makes a quick despatch, doth their business at once. Divine vengeance goes not by one certain rule, not in one constant track, but one way or other, by acute diseases or chronical ones, by speedy deaths or lingering ones, he will make an utter end of all his enemies who persist in their imaginations against him. We have reason to think that the Assyrian army were mostly of the same spirit, and spoke the same language, with their general; and now God will take them to task, though they did but say as they were taught; and it shall appear that they have laid themselves open to Divine wrath by their own act and deed, ver. 10. 1st. They are as thorns that entangle one another, and are folded together. They make one another worse, and more inveterate against God and his Israel, harden one another's hearts, and strengthen one another's hands in their impiety; and therefore God will do with them as the husbandman doth with a bush of thorns when he cannot part them; he puts them all into the fire together. 2nd. They are as drunken men, intoxicated with pride and rage, and such as they shall be irrecoverably overthrown and destroyed. They shall be as drunkards, besotted to their own ruin, and shall stumble and fall, and make themselves a reproach, and be justly laughed at. 3rd. They shall be "devoured as stubble fully dry," which is irresistibly and irrecoverably consumed by the flame. The judgments of God are as devouring fire to those that make themselves as stubble to them. It is again threatened against this great army, ver. 12, that "though they be quiet and likewise many," very secure, not fearing the sallies out of the besieged upon them because they are numerous, yet "thus shall they be cut down," or certainly shall they be cut down, as grass and corn are cut down, with as little ado, when he shall pass through, even the destroying angel that is commissioned to cut them down. Note, The security of sinners, and their confidence in their own strength, is often a presage of ruin approaching.

2. The destruction comes upon the king. He imagined evil against the Lord, and shall he escape? No; ver. 14, "The Lord hath given a commandment concerning thee;" the decree has gone forth, "that thy name be no more sown," that thy memory perish, and that thou be no more talked of as thou hast been, and the report of thy mighty actions dispersed upon the wings of fame, and celebrated with her trumpet. Because Sennacherib's son reigned in his stead, some make this to point at the overthrow of the Assyrian empire not long after. Note, Those that "imagine evil against the Lord" hasten evil upon themselves, and their own families and interests, and ruin their own names by dishonouring his name. It is farther threatened, 1st. That the images he worshipped should be cut off from their temple, the graven image and the "molten image out of the house of his gods," which some think was fulfilled when Sennacherib was slain by his two sons, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, by which barbarous parricide, we may suppose, the temple was looked upon as defiled, and was therefore disused, and the images cut off from it, the worshippers of those images no longer attending there. Or, it may be taken more generally to speak the utter ruin of Assyria; the army of the enemy shall lay all waste, and not spare even the images of their gods, by which God would intimate to them that one of the grounds of his controversy with them is their idolatry. 2nd. That Sennacherib's grave shall be made there. Some think, in the house of his god; there he is slain, and there he shall be buried, for he is vile. He lies under this perpetual mark of disgrace, that he had so far lost his interest in the natural affection of his own children, that two of them murdered him. Or, it may be meant of the ignominious fall of the Assyrian monarchy itself, upon the ruins of which that of Babylon was raised. What a noise was made about the grave of that once formidable state, but now despicable, is largely described, Eze. xxxi. 3, 11, 15, 16. Note, Those that make themselves vile by scandalous sins, God will make them vile by shameful punishments.

Thirdly. The great deliverance which God would hereby work for his own people, and the city that was called by his name. The ruin of the church's enemies is the salvation of the church; and a very great salvation it was that was wrought for Jerusalem by the overthrow of Sennacherib's army.

1. The siege shall hereby be raised; "Now will I break his yoke from off thee," by which thou art kept in servitude, and "will burst thy bonds in sunder," by which thou seemest bound over to the Assyrian's wrath. That vast victorious army, when it forced free quarters for itself throughout all the land of Judah, and lived at discretion there, was as yokes and bonds upon them. Jerusalem, when it was besieged, was, as it were, bound and fettered by it; but when the destroying angel had done his work Jerusalem's bonds were burst asunder, and it was set at liberty again. This was a figure of the great salvation by which the Jerusalem that is above is made free, is made free indeed.

2. The enemy shall be so weakened and dispirited that they shall never make any such attempt again, and the end of this trouble shall be so well gained by the grace of God, that there shall be no more occasion for such a severe correction. 1st. God will not again afflict Jerusalem. His anger is turned away, and he saith, It is enough; for he has by this fright accomplished his whole work upon mount Zion, Isa. x. 12, and therefore, "though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more;" the bitter potion shall not be repeated, unless there be need, and the patient's case calls for it, for God doth not afflict willingly. 2nd. The enemy shall not dare again to attack Jerusalem; ver. 15, "The wicked shall no more pass through thee" as they have done, to lay all waste, "for he is utterly cut off," and disabled to do it. His army is cut off, his spirit cut off, and at length he himself cut off.

3. The tidings of this great deliverance shall be published, and welcomed with abundance of joy throughout the kingdom, ver. 15. While Sennacherib prevailed and carried all before him, every day brought ill news, but now, "Behold upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings," the feet of the evangelist, he is seen coming at a distance, upon the mountains, as fast as his feet will carry him; and how pleasant a sight is it once more to see a messenger of peace, after we have received so many of Job's messengers? We find these words made use of by another prophet, to illustrate the mercy of the deliverance of the people of God out of Babylon, Isa. lii. 7; not that the prophets stole the words one from another, (as those did, Jer. xxiii. 30,) but, speaking by the same Spirit, they often used the same expressions. And it may be of good use for ministers to testify their consent to wholesome truths, (1 Tim. vi. 3,) by concurring in the same forms of sound words, 2 Tim. i. 13. These words are also quoted by the apostle, both from Isaiah and Nahum, and applied to the great redemption wrought out for us by our Lord Jesus, and the publishing of it to the world by the everlasting Gospel, Rom. x. 15. Christ's messengers are those messengers of good tidings that preach peace by Jesus Christ; how beautiful are the feet of those messengers, how welcome their message, to those that see their misery and danger by reason of sin! And observe, he that brings these good tidings brings them with a call to Judah to keep her solemn feasts, and perform her vows. During the trouble, 1st. The ordinary feasts had been intermitted; inter arma silent leges,—'the voice of law cannot be heard amidst the shouts of battle.' While Jerusalem was compassed with armies they could not go thither to worship, but now the embargo is taken off they must return to the observation of their feasts; and the feasts of the Lord will then be doubly sweet to the people of God when they have been for some time deprived of the benefit of them, and God graciously restores them their opportunities again, for we are taught the worth of such mercies by the want of them. 2nd. They had made vows to God, that if he would deliver them out of this distress they would do something extraordinary in his service to his honour; and now the deliverance is wrought they are called upon to perform their vows; the promise they had then made must now be made good, for better it is not to vow than to vow and not to pay. And those words, "The wicked shall no more pass through thee," may be taken as a promise of the perfecting the good work of reformation which Hezekiah had begun; the wicked shall not, as they have done, walk on every side, but they shall be cut off. And then the baffling of the attempts from the wicked enemies abroad is a mercy indeed to a nation, when it is accompanied with the restraint and reformation of the wicked at home, who are its more dangerous enemies.

CHAPTER II.

We now come closer to Nineveh, that great city; she took not warning by the destruction of her armies, and the fall of her king, and therefore may expect, since she persists in her enmity to God, that he will proceed in his controversy with her. Here is foretold, I. The approach of the enemy that should destroy Nineveh, and the terror of his military preparations, ver. 1—5. II. The taking the city, ver. 6. III. The captivity of the queen, the flight of the inhabitants, the seizing of all the wealth of it, and the mighty consternation it should be in, ver. 7—10. IV. All this is run up to its true causes, their sinning against God, and God's appearing against them, ver. 11—13. All this was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar, in the first year of his reign, in conjunction with Cyaxares, or Ahasuerus, king of the Medes, conquered Nineveh, and made himself master of the Assyrian monarchy.

HE that dasheth in pieces is come up before thy face:
Keep the munition, watch the way,
Make thy loins strong, fortify thy power mightily.
2 For the LORD hath turned away the excellency of Jacob,
As the excellency of Israel:
For the emptiers have emptied them out,
And marred their vine branches.
3 The shield of his mighty men is made red,
The valiant men are in scarlet:
The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation,
And the fir trees shall be terribly shaken.
4 The chariots shall rage in the streets,
They shall justle one against another in the broad ways:
They shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings. [walk;
5 He shall recount his worthies: they shall stumble in their
They shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence shall be prepared.
6 The gates of the rivers shall be opened,
And the palace shall be dissolved.
7 And Huzzab shall be led away captive,
She shall be brought up,
And her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves,
Tabering upon their breasts.
8 But Nineveh is of old like a pool of water: yet they shall flee away.
Stand, stand, shall they cry; but none shall look back.
9 Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold:
For there is none end of the store and glory
Out of all the pleasant furniture.
10 She is empty, and void, and waste:
And the heart melteth, and the knees smite together,
And much pain is in all loins,
And the faces of them all gather blackness.

Here is, First. An alarm of war sent to Nineveh, ver. 1. The prophet speaks of it as just at hand, for it is neither doubtful nor far distant; Look about thee and see, "He that dasheth in pieces is come up before thy face." Nebuchadnezzar, that is noted, and will be yet more so, for dashing nations in pieces, begins with thee, and will dissipate and disperse thee, so some render the word. Babylon is called the hammer of the whole earth, Jer. l. 23. The attempt of Nebuchadnezzar upon Nineveh is public, bold, and daring; he is come up before thy face, avowing his design to ruin thee. And, therefore, stand to thine arms, O Nineveh! "Keep the munition." Secure thy towers and magazines, "watch the way," set guards upon all the avenues to the city; "make thy loins strong," encourage thy soldiers; animate thyself and them; "fortify thy power mightily," as cities use to do when an enemy is advancing against them. This is spoken ironically: Do the utmost thou canst, yet thou shalt not be able to put by the stroke of this judgment, for there is no counsel or strength against the Lord.

Secondly. A manifesto published shewing the causes of the war; ver. 2, "The Lord has turned away the excellency of Jacob as the excellency of Israel." That is,

1. The Assyrians have been abusive to Jacob, the two tribes, have humbled and mortified them, as well as to Israel, the ten tribes; have emptied them, and "marred their vine branches;" and for this God will reckon with them. Though done long since, it shall come into the account now against that kingdom, and Nineveh the head city of it. God's quarrel with them is for the violence done to Jacob. Or,

2. God is now, by Nebuchadnezzar, about to turn away the pride of Jacob, by the captivity of the two tribes, as he did the pride of Israel, by their captivity. He has done it, he has determined to do it, to bring emptiers upon them; and the enemy that is to do it must begin with Nineveh, and reduce that first, and humble the pride of that. God is looking upon proud cities and abasing them, even those that were nearest to him; Samaria is humbled, and Jerusalem is to be humbled, and their pride brought low, and shall not Nineveh, that proud city, be brought down too? "Emptiers have emptied" the cities, and "marred the vine branches" in the country of Jacob and Israel; and must not the excellency of Nineveh, that is so much her pride, be turned away too?

Thirdly. A particular account given in of the terrors wherein the invading enemy shall appear against Nineveh; every thing shall contribute to make him formidable.

1. The "shields of his mighty men are made red," and probably their other arms and array; as if they were already tinctured with the blood they had shed, or intended hereby to signify they would put all to the sword: they hung out a red flag in token that they would give no quarter.

2. "The valiant men are in scarlet;" not only red clothes, to intimate what bloody work they designed to make, but rich clothes, to intimate the wealth of the army, and that is the sinews of war.

3. "The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation." When they are making their approaches, they shall fly as swift as lightning, the wheels shall strike fire upon the stones, and those that drive them shall drive furiously, with a flaming indignation, as Jehu drove. Or, they carried flaming torches with them in the open chariots, when they made their approach in the night, as Gideon's soldiers carried lamps in their pitchers, both to be a guide to themselves and a terror to their enemies, and with them to set all on fire wherever they went.

4 "The fir-trees shall be terribly shaken;" the great men of Nineveh, that overtop their neighbours, as the stately firs do the shrubs; or the very standing trees shall be made to shake by the violent concussions of the earth which that great army shall cause.

5. The chariots of war shall be very terrible; ver. 4, "They shall rage in the streets," that is, those that drive them shall rage, you would think the chariots themselves raged. They shall be so numerous, and drive with so much fury, that even in the broad ways, where one would think there should be room enough, they shall jostle one another; and these iron chariots shall be made so bright, that in the beams of the sun "they shall seem like torches" in the night, "they shall run like the lightnings," so swiftly, so furiously. Nebuchadnezzar's commanders are here called his worthies, his 'gallants,' so the margin reads it, his heroes; those he shall recount, and order them immediately and without fail to render themselves at their respective posts; for he is entering upon action, is resolved to take the field presently, and to open the campaign with the siege of Nineveh. His worthies shall remember, so some read it; they shall be mindful of the duty of their place, and the charge they have received, and shall thereby be made so intent upon their business that "they shall stumble in their walk," shall make more haste than good speed. They stumble, but shall not fall; for "they shall make haste to the wall thereof," shall open the trenches, and the defence of the covered way shall be prepared, something to shelter them from the darts of the besieged; and they shall so closely carry on the siege, and with so much vigour, that at length the "gates of the rivers shall be opened," ver. 6; that is, those gates of Nineveh which open upon the river Tigris, (on which Nineveh was built,) shall be first forced by, or betrayed to, the enemy, and by those gates they shall enter. And then "the palace shall be dissolved," either the king's house, or the house of Nisroch his god; the same word signifies both a palace and temple. When the God of heaven goes forth to contend with a people, neither the palaces nor their kings, neither the temples nor their gods, can protect and shelter them, but must all inevitably fall with them.

Fourthly. A prediction of the consequences of this; and it is easy to guess how dismal those will be.

1. The queen shall fall into the hands of the enemy; ver. 7, "Huzzab shall be led away captive." She that was 'established,' so some read it, thought herself safe, because she was concealed and shut up in secret, shall be 'discovered,' so the margin reads it, and shall be led away captive in greater disgrace than that of common prisoners. She shall be brought up in a mock state, and her maids of honour shall lead her, because she is weak and faint, not able to bear such frights and hardships, which are doubly hard and frightful to those that have not been used to them. They shall attend her, not to speak cheerfully to her, and to encourage her, but murmuring and moaning themselves, as with the voice of doves, the doves of the valleys, Eze. vii. 16, noted for their mourning, Isa. xxxviii. 14; lix. 11. They shall be tabering upon their breasts, beating their own breasts in grief and vexation, as if they were drumming upon them, for so the word signifies.

2. The inhabitants, though numerous, shall none of them be able to make head against the invaders, or stand their ground; ver. 8, "Nineveh is of old like a pool of water," replenished with people as a pool with water, (and waters signify multitudes, Rev. xvii. 15,) or as those waters with fish. It was long ago a populous city; in Jonah's time there were an hundred and twenty thousand little children in it, Jon. iv. 11, and, ordinarily, cities and countries are increasing in their numbers every year; but though they have so many hands to be employed in the public service, yet they shall not be able to inspire one another with courage, but "they shall flee away" like cowards. Their commanders shall do what they can to animate them; they shall cry "Stand, stand," have a good heart on it, and we shall do well enough; "but none shall" so much as look back." They shall have not the least spark of courage remaining, but every one shall think it his wisest course to make the best of the opportunity to escape; they shall not so much as look back to see who calls for them. Note, God can dispirit the strongest and boldest in the day of distress, so that they shall not be what one would expect from them, but "like a pool of water," the water whereof is dried up and gone.

3. The wealth of the city shall become a prey, and all its rich furniture shall fall into the hands of the victorious enemy, ver. 9; they shall thus animate and excite one another to plunder, "Take the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold." Thus the officers shall stir up the soldiers to improve their opportunity; here is silver and gold enough for them, for "there is no end of the store" of money and plate. Nineveh, having been "of old like a pool of water," has gathered a vast deal of mud; and abundance of glory it has "out of all the pleasant furniture," all the vessels of desire which they have gloried in, and which shall now be a prey and a pride to the conquerors. Note, Those who prepare raiment as the clay, and heap up silver as the dust, know not who may put on the raiment, and divide the silver, Job xxvii. 16, 17. Thus this rich city is empty, and void, and waste, ver. 10. See the vanity of worldly wealth; instead of defending its owners it does but expose them, and enable their enemies to do them so much the more mischief.

4. The soldiers and people shall have no heart to appear for the defence of the city. Their spirits shall melt away like wax before the fire; their "knees shall smite together," as Belshazzar's did in his agony, Dan. v. 6, so that they shall not be able to stand their ground, no, nor to make their escape; much pain shall be in all loins, as useth to be in extreme frights, so that they shall not be able to hold up their backs. And the "faces of them all shall gather blackness," like that of a pot that is every day over the fire, so the word signifies. Note, Guilt in the conscience will fill men with terror in an evil day, and those who place their happiness in the wealth of this world, and set their hearts upon it, think themselves undone when their silver and their gold, and their pleasant furniture, is taken from them.

11 Where is the dwelling of the lions,
And the feedingplace of the young lions,
Where the lion, even the old lion, walked,
And the lion's whelp, and none made them afraid?
12 The lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps,
And strangled for his lionesses,
And filled his holes with prey,
And his dens with ravin.
13 Behold, I am against thee, saith the LORD of hosts,
And I will burn her chariots in the smoke,
And the sword shall devour thy young lions:
And I will cut off thy prey from the earth,
And the voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard.

Here we have Nineveh's ruin,

First. Triumphed in by its neighbours, who now remember against it all the oppressions and abuse of power it had been guilty of in its pomp and prosperity; ver. 11, 12, "Where is the dwelling of the lions?" It is gone, there appear no remnants, no footsteps of it; "Where is the feeding-place of the young lions," where they glutted themselves with prey? The princes of Nineveh had been as lions, as beasts of prey. Cruel tyrants are no better, nay, in this respect much worse, that being men, humanity is expected from them; nay, if they were indeed lions, they would not prey upon those of their own kind. Sævis inter se convenit ursæ,—'fierce bears agree together;' but in the shape of men they have the cruelty of lions. They walked in Nineveh as a lion in the woods, and none made them afraid; every one stood in awe of them, and they were under no apprehensions of danger from any; though nobody loved them everybody feared them, and that was all they desired. Oderint dum metuant,—'Let them hate, so that they do but fear.' The king himself and every prince made it his business, by all the arts of violence and extortion, to enrich himself and raise his family; he did "tear in pieces enough for his whelps," (and no little would be enough for them,) and he "strangled for his lionesses;" killed all that came near him, and seized what they had for his children, for his wives, and concubines, and "filled his holes with prey," and his dens with rapine, as lions use to do. Note, Many make it an excuse for their rapine and injustice that they have wives and children to provide for, whereas what is so got will never do them any good. They that fear the Lord, and get what they have honestly, shall not want a competency for themselves and theirs; verily they shall be fed, when the young lions, though dens and holes were filled with prey and rapine for them, shall lack and suffer hunger, Ps. xxxiv. 10.

Secondly. It is avowed by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth; it is his doing, and let all the world take notice that it is so; ver. 13, "Behold, I am against thee, saith the Lord of hosts." And what good can hosts do for her in her defence, when the Lord of hosts is against her for her destruction? The oppressors in Nineveh thought they only set their neighbours against them, who were not a match for them, and whom they could easily overpower; but it proved they set God against them, who is, who will be, the asserter of right and the avenger of wrong. God is against the princes of Nineveh, and then, 1. These military preparations will stand them in no stead. "I will burn her chariots in the smoke;" he doth not say in the fire, but, in contempt to them, the very smoke of God's indignation shall serve to burn their chariots. They shall be consumed as soon as the fire of his indignation is kindled, while as yet it doth but smoke, and not flame out. Or, the drivers of the chariots shall be smothered and stifled with the smoke; then the chariots of their glory shall be the shame of their families, Isa. xxii. 18. 2. Their children, the hopes of their families, shall be cut off; "the sword shall devour the young lions," whom they were so solicitous to provide for by oppression and extortion. Note, It is just with God to deprive those of their children, or (which is all one) of comfort in them, that take sinful courses to enrich them, and, as has been said of some, damn their souls to make their sons gentlemen. 3. The wealth they have heaped up by fraud and violence shall neither be enjoyed by them nor employed for them. "I will cut off thy prey from the earth," not only thou shalt not be the better for it, but no one else shall. Some understand it of the disabling of them for the future to prey upon their neighbours. 4. Their agents abroad shall not have that respect from their neighbours, and that influence upon them, which sometimes they had had. "The voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard," no more be heeded; which some think refers to Rabshakeh, one of Nineveh's messengers, that had blasphemed the living God; an iniquity which was remembered against Nineveh long after. Those are not worthy to be heard again that have once spoken reproachfully of God.

CHAPTER III.

This chapter goes on with the burden of Nineveh, and concludes it. I. The sins of that great city are charged upon it: murder, ver. 1; whoredom and witchcraft, ver. 4; and a general extent of wickedness, ver. 19. II. Judgments are here threatened against it: blood for blood, ver. 2, 3; and shame for shameful sins, ver. 5, 6, 7. III. Instances are given of the like desolations brought upon other places for the like sins, ver. 8—11. IV. The overthrow of all those things which they depended upon, and put confidence in, is foretold, ver. 12—19.

WOE to the bloody city! [not;
It is all full of lies and robbery; the prey departeth
The noise of a whip, and the noise of the rattling of the wheels,
And of the pransing horses, and of the jumping chariots.
3 The horseman lifteth up both the bright sword and the glittering spear: [carcases;
And there is a multitude of slain, and a great number of
And there is none end of their corpses;
They stumble upon their corpses:
4 Because of the multitude of the whoredoms of the well-favoured harlot,
The mistress of witchcrafts,
That selleth nations through her whoredoms,
And families through her witchcrafts.
5 Behold, I am against thee, saith the LORD of hosts;
And I will discover thy skirts upon thy face,
And I will shew the nations thy nakedness, and the kingdoms thy shame. [thee vile,
6 And I will cast abominable filth upon thee, and make
And will set thee as a gazingstock.
7 And it shall come to pass,

That all they that look upon thee shall flee from thee,
And say, Nineveh is laid waste:
Who will bemoan her?
Whence shall I seek comforters for thee?

Here is, First. Nineveh arraigned and indicted. It is a high charge that is here drawn up against that great city, and neither her numbers nor her grandeur shall secure her from persecution. 1. It is a city of blood, that is, in which a great deal of innocent blood is shed, (which the righteous God will make inquisition for,) either by unrighteous war or under colour and pretence of public justice, or by suffering barbarous murders to go unpunished. 2. "It is all full of lies." Truth is banished from among them; there is no such thing as honesty, one knows not whom to believe and whom to trust. 3. It is all full of robbery and rapine; no man cares what mischief he doth, nor to whom he doth it; "the prey departeth not," that is, they never knew when they had got enough by spoil and oppression. They shed blood and told lies in pursuit of the prey, that they might enrich themselves. 4. There is a "multitude of whoredoms" in it, that is, idolatries, spiritual whoredoms, by which she defiled herself, and to which she seduced the neighbour nations, as a "well-favoured harlot," and sold and ruined "nations through her whoredoms." 5. She is a "mistress of witchcrafts," and by them she sells families, ver. 4. That which Nineveh aimed at was a universal monarchy, to be the metropolis of the world, and to have all her neighbours under her feet; to compass this she used not only arms but arts; compelling some, but deluding others, into subjection to her, and wheedling them, as a harlot by her charms, to lay their necks under her yoke, suggesting to them that it would be for their advantage. She courted them to join with her in her idolatrous rites, to tie them the faster to her interests; and made use of her wealth, power, and greatness to draw people into alliances with her, by which she gained advantages over them, and made a hand of them. These were her whoredoms, like those of Tyre, Isa. xxiii. 15, 17; these were her witchcrafts, with which she unaccountably gained dominion. And for this, that God has a quarrel with her who, having made of one blood all nations of men, never designed one to be a nation of tyrants and another of slaves, and who claims it as his own prerogative to be universal monarch.

Secondly. Nineveh condemned to ruin upon this indictment. Woe to this bloody city! ver. 1. See what this woe is.

1. Nineveh had with her cruelties been a terror and destruction to others, and therefore destruction and terror shall be brought upon her. Those that are for overthrowing all that come in their way will, sooner or later, meet with their match. 1st. Hear the alarm with which Nineveh shall be terrified, ver. 2. It is a formidable army that advanceth against it; you may hear them at a distance,—the noise of the whip, driving the chariot horses with fury; hear the noise of the "rattling of the wheels, the prancing horses, and the jumping chariots;" the very noise is frightful, but much more so when they know that all this force is coming with all this speed against them, and they are not able to make head against it. 2nd. See the slaughter with which Nineveh shall be laid waste, ver. 3; the sword drawn, with which execution shall be done, "the bright sword lifted up," and the glittering spear, the dazzling brightness of which is very terrible to those whom they are lifted up against. See what havoc these make when they are commissioned to slay; "There is a great number of carcases," for the slain of the land shall be many, "there is no end of their corpses;" there is such a "multitude of slain" that it is in vain to go about to take the number of them, they lie so thick that passengers are ready to stumble upon their corpses at every step. The destruction of Sennacherib's army, which in the morning were all dead corpses, is perhaps looked upon here as a figure of the like destruction that should afterwards be in Nineveh; for they that will not take warning by judgments at a distance shall have them come nearer.

2. Nineveh had with her whoredoms and witchcrafts drawn others to shameful wickedness, and therefore God will load her with shame and contempt, ver. 5—7. The Lord of hosts is against her, and then she shall be exposed to the highest degree of disgrace and ignominy,—shall not only lose all her charms, but shall be made to appear very odious. When it shall be seen that while she courted her neighbours it was with design to ruin their liberty and property,—when all her wicked artifices shall be brought to light,—then her shame is discovered to the nations. When her proud pretensions are baffled, and her vain towering hopes of an absolute and universal dominion brought to nought, and she appears not to have been so strong and considerable as she would have been thought to be, then to see the nakedness of the land do they come, and it appears ridiculous. Then do they cast abominable filth upon her, as upon a carted whore, and make her vile, as the offscouring of all things; that great city which all the nations had made court to, and coveted an alliance with, is become a gazingstock, a laughingstock. They that, when time was, looked upon her, and fled to her in hopes of protection from her, now look upon her and flee from her, for fear of being ruined with her. Note, Those that abuse their honour and interest will justly be disgraced and abandoned, and because miserable will be made contemptible, and thereby be made more miserable. When Nineveh is laid waste, who will bemoan her? Her trouble will be so great, and her sense of it so deep, as not to admit relief from sympathy, or any comforting considerations; or, if it would, none shall do any such good office; "Whence shall I seek comforters for thee?" Note, Those that shewed no pity in their day of power can expect to find no pity in the day of their fall. When those about Nineveh, that had been deceived by her wiles, come to be undeceived in her ruin, every one shall insult over her, and none bemoan her. This was Nineveh's fate, when she was made a spectacle or gazing-stock. Note, The greater men's show was in the day of their abused prosperity, the greater will their shame be in the day of their deserved destruction. 'I will make thee an example,' so Drusius reads it. Note, When proud sinners are humbled and brought down, it is designed that others should take example by them, not to lift up themselves in security and insolence when they prosper in the world.

Nineveh has been told that God is against her, and then none can be for her to stand her in any stead; yet she sets God himself at defiance, and his power and justice, and saith she shall have peace. Threatened folks live long, therefore here the prophet largely shews how vain her confidence would prove, and insufficient to ward off the judgment of God. To convince them of this,

First. He shews them that other places, which had been as strong and as secure as they, yet could not keep their ground against the judgments of God. Nineveh shall fall unpitied and uncomforted, (for miserable comforters will they prove that speak peace to those on whom God will fasten trouble,) and she shall not be able to help herself; for, "Art thou better than populous No?" ver. 8. He takes them off from their vain confidences, by quoting precedents; the city instanced is No, a great city in the land of Egypt, Jer. xlvi. 25; 'No-Ammon,' so some read it, both there and here. We read of it, Eze. xxx. 14—16. Some think it was Diospolis, others Alexandria. As God said to Jerusalem, Go see what I did to Shiloh, Jer. vii. 12, so to Nineveh, that great city, Go see what I did to populous No. Note, It will help to keep up in us a holy fear of the judgments of God, to consider that we are not better than those that have fallen under those judgments before us. We deserve them as much, and are as little able to grapple with them. This also should help to reconcile us to afflictions, Are we better than such and such that were in like manner exercised? nay, were not they better than us, and less likely to be so afflicted? Now concerning No, observe,

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO NAHUM.

1. How firm her standing seemed to be, ver. 8. She was fortified both by nature and art, was situate among the rivers. Nile in several branches not only watered her fields, but guarded her wall,—her rampart was the sea, the lake of Mareotis, an Egyptian sea, like the sea of Tiberias; her "wall was from the sea;" it was fenced with a wall which was thought to make the place impregnable. It was also supported by its interests and alliances abroad, ver. 9; Ethiopia or Arabia were her strength, either by the wealth they brought to her in a way of trade or by the auxiliary forces they furnished her with for military services; the whole country of Egypt also contributed to the strength of this populous city, so that it was infinite, and there was no end of it—so it might be rendered; she set no bounds to her ambition, and knew no end of her wealth and strength. People flocked to her endlessly, and she thought there never would be any end of it; but it is God's prerogative to be infinite. "Put and Lubim were thy helpers," two neighbouring countries of Africa, Mauritania and Libya, namely, Libya Cyrenæa, a country that Egypt had much dependence upon. No thus helped seemed to sit as a queen, and was not likely to see any sorrow. But,

2. See how fatal her fall proved to be; ver. 10, "Yet was she carried away," and her strength failed her, even she that was so strong, so secure, yet went into captivity. This refers to some destruction of that city which was then well known, and probably fresh in memory, though not recorded in history; for the destruction of it by Nebuchadnezzar (if we should understand this prophetically) could not be made an example to Nineveh; for the reducing of Nineveh was one of the first of his victories, and that of Egypt one of the last. The strength and grandeur of that great city could not be its protection from military execution. 1st. Not from that which was most barbarous; for her young children had no compassion shewed them, but were "dashed in pieces at the top of all the streets," by the merciless conquerors. 2nd. Not from that which was most inglorious and disgraceful. "They cast lots for their honourable men," that were made prisoners of war, who should have them for their slaves; so many had they of them that they knew not what to do with them; but they made sport with throwing dice for them. "All her great men," that used to be adorned on state days with chains of gold, were now bound in chains of iron; they were pinioned or handcuffed, so the word properly signifies, not only as slaves, but as condemned malefactors. What a mortification was this to populous No, to have her honourable men and great men, that were her pride and confidence, thus abused! Now, from hence he infers against Nineveh, ver. 11, thou also shalt be intoxicated, infatuated; thou also shalt reel and stagger, as drunk with the cup of the Lord's fury, that shall be put into thy hands: see Jer. xxv. 17, 27, "Thou shalt fall and rise no more." The cup shall go round, and come to thy turn, O Nineveh! to drink off at last, and shall be to thee as the waters of jealousy.

Secondly. He shews them that all those things which they reposed a confidence in should fail.

1. Did the men of Nineveh trust to their own magnanimity and bravery? Their hearts should sink and fail them; "They shall be hid," shall abscond for shame, being in disgrace, abscond for fear, being in distress and danger; and not able to face the enemies, because of whose strength and terror, having no strength of their own, they shall seek strength, shall come sneaking to their neighbours to beg their assistance in a time of need. Thus God can cut off the spirit of princes, and take away their heart.

2. Did they depend upon their barrier, the garrisons and strongholds they had, which were regularly fortified, and bravely manned? Those shall prove but paper walls, and "like the first-ripe figs," which, if you give the tree but a little shake, "will fall into the mouth of the eater" that gapes for them; so easily will all thy strongholds be made to surrender to the advancing enemy, upon the first summons, ver. 12. Note, Strongholds, even the strongest, are no fence against the judgments of God, when they come with commission. The rich man's wealth is his strong city and a high wall, but only in his own conceit, Pr. xviii. 10. They are supposed to make their strongholds as strong as possible, and are challenged to do their utmost to make them tenable and serviceable to them against the invader; ver. 14, "Draw thee water for the siege," lay in great quantities of water, that that which is so necessary to the support of human life may not be wanting. It is put here for all manner of provision, with which Nineveh is ironically bid to furnish herself in expectation of a siege. Take never so much care that thou mayest not be starved out, and forced by famine to surrender, yet that shall not avail; "Fortify the strongholds" by adding outworks to them, or putting men or arms into them, as with us by planting cannon upon them. "Go into clay, and tread the mortar," and "make strong the brick-kiln," take all the pains thou canst in erecting new fortifications; but it shall be all in vain, for, ver. 15, there shall even "the fire devour thee," if the stronghold be burnt; or, "the sword cut thee off," if it be taken by storm. It is by fire and sword that, in time of war, the great devastations are made.

3. Did they put a confidence in the multitude of their inhabitants? were they reckoned their strongest walls and fortifications? in their number, their valour? Alas! these shall stand them in no stead, they shall but sink the sooner under the weight of their own numbers; ver. 13, "Thy people in the midst of thee are women," they have no conduct, no courage; they shall be fickle, feeble, and faint-hearted, as women commonly are in such times of danger and distress; they shall be at their wits' end, adding to their griefs and fears by the power of their own indignation, and utterly unable to do any thing for themselves; the valiant men shall become cowards, O vere Phrygiæ, neque enim Phryges,—'Phrygian dames, not Phrygian men.' Though they make themselves many (ver. 15) as the canker-worm and as the locust, that come in vast swarms, "though thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of heaven," though thy exchange be thronged with wealthy traders that, having so much money to stand up in defence of, and so much to lay out in the means of their defence, one would think they should give the enemy a warm reception, yet their hearts shall fail them too; though they be numerous as caterpillars, yet the fire and sword shall eat them up, easily and irresistibly as the canker-worm, ver. 15; they are as numerous as those wasting insects, but their enemies shall be mischievous like them. He adds, ver. 16, "The canker-worm spoileth," or spreadeth herself, "and flieth away." Both the merchants and the enemies were compared to canker-worms. The enemies shall spoil Nineveh, and carry away the spoil without opposition, or any hope of recovering it. Or, the rich merchants, that have come from abroad to settle in Nineveh, and have raised vast estates there, out of which it was hoped they would contribute largely for the defence of the city, when they see the country invaded, and the city likely to be besieged, will send away their effects, and remove themselves to some other place; will spread their wings and fly away where they may be safe, and Nineveh shall be never the better for them. Note, It is rare to find even those that have shared with us in our joys willing to share with us in our griefs too. The canker-worms will continue upon the field while there is any thing to be had, but they are gone when all is gone. Those that men have got by yet they do not care to lose by. Nineveh's merchants bade her farewell in her distress. Riches themselves are as the canker-worms that on a sudden "fly away as the eagle towards heaven," Pr. xxiii. 5.

4. Did they put a confidence in the strength of their gates and bars? What fence will those be against the force of the judgments of God? ver. 13, "The gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thine enemies," the gates of thy rivers, ch. ii. 5, the flood-gates, or the passes and avenues, by which the enemy would make his entrance into the country; or the gates of the cities, these, though never so strong and well-guarded, shall not answer their end; "The fire shall devour thy bars," the bars of thy gates, and then they shall fly open.

5. Did they put a confidence in their kings and princes? They should do them no service; ver. 17, "Thy crowned are as the locusts;" those that had pomp and power, as crowned heads, were enfeebled, and had no power to make resistance when the enemy came in like a flood. Thy captains, that should lead thy forces into the field, are great indeed, and look great; but they are as the great grasshoppers, maximum quod sic,—'the largest specimens' of that species; still they are but grasshoppers, worthless, that can do no service. "They camp in the hedges in the cold day," the cold weather, but "when the sun ariseth, they flee away," and are gone, nobody knows whither. So these mercenary soldiers, that lay slumbering about Nineveh, when any trouble ariseth, flee away, and shift for their own safety. The hireling flees because he is a hireling. The king of Assyria is told, and it is a shame he needs to be told it who might observe it himself, that "his shepherds slumber;" they have no life or spirit to appear for the flock, and are very remiss in the discharge of the duty of their place, and the trust reposed in them. "Thy nobles shall dwell in the dust," and be buried in silence.

6. Did they hope that they should yet recover themselves, and rally again? In this also they shall be disappointed; for, when the shepherds are smitten, the "sheep are scattered;" the people are dispersed "upon the mountains," and "no man gathereth them," nor will they ever come together of themselves, but will wander endlessly, as scattered sheep do. The judgment they are under is as a wound, and it is incurable; there is no relief for it, "no healing of thy bruise," no possibility that the wound which is so grievous and painful to thee should be so much as skinned over; thy case is desperate, ver. 19, and thy neighbours, instead of lending a hand to help thee, "shall clap their hands over thee," and triumph in thy fall; and the reason is, because thou hast been one way or other injurious to them all; "Upon whom has not thy wickedness passed continually?" Thou hast been always doing mischief to those about thee; there is none of them but what thou hast abused and insulted; and therefore they shall be so far from pitying thee, that they shall be glad to see thee reckoned with. Note, Those that have been abusive to their neighbours, it will one time or other come against them; they are but preparing enemies to themselves against their day comes to fall; and those that dare not lay hands on them themselves will clap their hands over them, and upbraid them with their former wickedness, for which they are now well enough served, and paid in their own coin. The troublers shall be troubled will be the burden of many, as it is here the burden of Nineveh.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF NAHUM.

CHAP. I.—1. The burden of Nineveh. Supplementary Note on Jon. iii. 2, 3. When they, the Assyrians, had served the purposes of Divine providence, they were to be severely punished for their pride and ambition, their tyranny and cruelty to their neighbours; "Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon mount Zion, and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks." There was no prospect of such an event while the Assyrians were in the midst of their successes and triumphs, but still the word of the prophet prevailed; and it was not long after these calamities brought upon the Jews, by their instrumentality, that the Assyrian empire, properly so called, was overthrown, and Nineveh destroyed. Nineveh, or Ninus, as it was most usually called by the Greeks and Romans, was the capital city of the Assyrian empire; and the capital is frequently put for the whole empire, the prosperity or ruin of the one being involved in that of the other.——Nahum plainly and largely foretold the destruction of Nineveh; his whole prophecy relates to this single event; and the city was accordingly destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians. These two rebelling and uniting together subverted the Assyrian empire. There is some difficulty in discovering the persons by whom Nineveh was taken, there is more in ascertaining the king of Assyria in whose reign it was taken, and more still in fixing the time when it was taken, scarce any two chronologers agreeing in the same date: but as these things are hardly possible to be known, so neither are they necessary to be known, with precision and exactness, and we may safely leave them among the uncertainties of ancient history and chronology. It is sufficient for our purpose that Nineveh was taken and destroyed according to the predictions; and Nahum foretold not only the thing, but also the manner of it. Herodotus promised to relate in his Assyrian history how Nineveh was taken: the Medes took Nineveh, saith he, but how they took it I will shew in another work. Again afterwards he mentions his design of writing the Assyrian history. Speaking of the kings of Babylon, he saith, Of these I shall make mention in the Assyrian history. But, to our regret, this history was never finished, or is lost. More probably it was never finished, for otherwise some or other of the ancients would have mentioned it. If it had been extant with his other works, it would in all probability have been of great service in illustrating several passages in Nahum's prophecies. It is, however, something fortunate that we can in some measure supply this loss out of Diodorus Siculus.—Bishop Newton on the Prophecies. 9. What do ye imagine against the Lord. By a sudden apostrophe Nahum here turns to the invaders, and boldly challenges them to account for their temerity in daring to oppose themselves to Jehovah. On which he repeats what he had declared in the preceding verse respecting the total destruction of the Assyrian power, and adds, for the special encouragement of the Jews, that it should never annoy them again. 12. Thus saith the Lord. A description of the formidable appearance of the hostile army, accompanied with a prediction of its sudden and complete annihilation, the flight of Sennacherib, and the future immunity of the Jews from an invasion on the part of the Assyrians. Though they be quiet. Or, 'complete,' as translated by Dr. Henderson, conveying the idea either of martial completeness, as being fully provided with every thing requisite for the successful siege of Jerusalem, or mental completeness, that is, in this connexion, security, martial courage. And likewise many. Sennacherib invaded Judæa with an army of nearly two hundred thousand men. Yet thus shall they be cut down, when he shall pass through.

Thus saith Jehovah:
Though they are complete and so very numerous,
Yet in this state they shall be cut down,
And he shall pass away.

The change of number from the plural, 'they are, or shall be cut down,' to 'he passeth away,' is obviously intended to distinguish between the overthrow of the Assyrian army and the immediate departure of Sennacherib to his own land. To cut, or mow down, is a metaphor derived from the hay harvest, and forcibly sets forth the sudden and entire destruction of an army. See for the historical facts, 2 Kin. xix. 35; Isa. xxxvii. 36, 37; and Supplementary Note on this last text.—H. We are not prevented by the inconsistencies of the man from giving insertion to the beautiful lines of the poet.

'The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strown.

For the angel of death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed in the face of the foe as he pass'd;
And the eyes of the sleepers wax'd deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved, and for ever grew still!

And there lay the steed with his nostril all wide,
But through it there roll'd not the breath of his pride;
And the foam of his gasping lay white on the turf,
And cold as the spray of the rock-beating surf.

And there lay the rider distorted and pale,
With the dew on his brow and the rust on his mail;
And the tents were all silent, the banners alone,
The lances unlifted, the trumpet unblown.

And the widows of Ashur are loud in their wail,
And the idols are broke in the temple of Baal;
And the might of the Gentile, unsmote by the sword,
Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!'

CHAP. II.—3. The valiant men are in scarlet. Eze. xxiii. 14, 15, and Supplementary Note, in loc. 6. The gates of the rivers shall be opened. Diodorus informs us that there was an old prophecy that Nineveh should not be taken till the river became an enemy to the city; and in the third year of the siege the river being swollen with continual rains, overflowed part of the city, and broke down the wall for twenty furlongs; then the king, thinking that the oracle was fulfilled, and the river become an enemy to the city, built a large funeral pile in the palace, and, collecting together all his wealth and his concubines and eunuchs, burnt himself and the palace with them all; and the enemy entered the breach that the waters had made, and took the city. 9. Take ye the spoil of silver. We read, in Diodorus, that Arbaces carried many talents of gold and silver to Ecbatana, the royal city of the Medes. 10. She is empty, and void, and waste. The original is strongly emphatic: the words are of the same sound; and increase in their length as they point out great, greater, and greatest desolation.

Bukah, umebukah, umebullakah.
She is void, empty, and desolate.—A. Clarke.

CHAP. III.—1. Woe to the bloody city. Nineveh; the threatenings against which are continued in a strain of invective, astonishing for its richness, variety, and energy. One may hear and see the whip crack, the horses prancing, the wheels rumbling, the chariots bounding after the galloping steeds, the reflection from the drawn and highly polished swords, and the hurled spears, like flashes of lightning, dazzling the eyes; the slain lying in heaps, and horses and chariots stumbling over them! O what a picture, and a true representation of a battle, when one side is broken, and all the cavalry of the conqueror fall in upon them, hewing them down with their swords, and trampling them to pieces under the hoofs of their horses! Oh, infernal war! Yet sometimes thou art the scourge of the Lord.—A. Clarke. See wood engravings from Assyrian marbles in Isa. vii., viii.; Jer. xxii., xxix. 7. Nineveh is laid waste. Supplementary Note to Zephaniah. See wood engravings, and Isa. vii., viii.; Jer. xxii., xxix. 8. Art thou better than populous No? Margin, Amon, (Jer. xlvi. 25.) The residence or possession of the Egyptian deity known by the name of Jupiter Ammon. The statement of Macrobius, that he was the representative of the sun, is confirmed by the name of Amon-Re, that is, 'Amon, the sun,' being given to him in Egyptian inscriptions. On Egyptian monuments this god is represented by the figure of a man sitting upon a chair, with a ram's head, or by that of an entire ram. The city, which, from its being the principal seat of his worship, was called by the Greeks Diospolis, is the celebrated Thebes, the ancient capital of Upper Egypt, situated on both sides of the Nile, about two hundred and sixty miles south of Cairo. It was renowned for its hundred gates, and was of such extent that its remaining ruins still describe a circuit of twenty-seven miles.

Not all proud Thebes' unrivall'd walk contains
The world's great empress on th' Egyptian plains,
That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states,
And pours her heroes through a hundred gates;
Two hundred horsemen and two hundred cars
From each wide portal issuing to the wars.—Pope's Homer.

Of the magnificent ruins, the most remarkable are the temples of Luxor and Karnac, on the eastern side of the river. The architecture is of the most gigantic and superior description. Fragments of colossal obelisks and statues are found in every direction. The stupendous colonnade at Luxor is in the highest degree imposing; but the grand hall of the temple at Karnac is of surpassing interest. (See wood engravings, Jer. xlvi., and Eze. xxx., xl., xlii.) Wilkinson, in his Thebes, p. 174, describes it as 'one hundred and seventy feet by three hundred and twenty-nine, supported by a central avenue of twelve massive columns, sixty-six feet high, (without the pedestal and abacus,) and twelve in diameter, besides one hundred and twenty-two of smaller, or rather less gigantic, dimensions, forty-one feet nine inches in height, and twenty-seven feet six inches in circumference, distributed in seven lines on either side of the former.' The walls of the temples are covered with hieroglyphics, chiefly representing the victories gained by the Egyptian kings over their enemies. One of the walls exhibits the result of the expedition of Shishak against Jerusalem, 1 Kin. xiv. 25, &c., 2 Chr. xii. 2—9, in the leading away of the Jewish captives. Of the conquest of this famous city, here referred to by Nahum, no mention is made in profane history, but it not improbably took place on the advance of the Assyrian army under Sargon, in the year B. C. 714. It was aftewards taken by Cambyses, B. C. 525, and its ruin completed by Ptolemy Lathyrus, B. C. 81. No, that was situate among the waters. Thebes—populous No—was watered by the Nile, somewhat in the manner that Babylon was by the Euphrates, and Nineveh by the Tigris; accordingly, the ruins of the city are seen on the west of the river as well as on the east. Here, too, are the remains of temples. Here are colossal statues and sphinxes innumerable, half buried in the soil, which ages have accumulated around them. These have beheld generations rise and fade on the plains of Egypt; they have seen dynasties sink at their feet; on them the day of glory has shone, and now the night of ruin darkens around them; still they wait here, to welcome, with the same look of austere majesty, the stranger who comes from a far land to gaze on them; and here they will remain, no doubt, till the end of time, shedding a dim glory on these plains—the twilight of a day of splendour which has passed away, never more to return. Here, too, separated from the ruins of the city by a range of naked hills, in a low, winding, gloomy valley, shut in by iron rocks, are the 'Tombs of the Kings.' They are gorgeous halls, hewn in the heart of the mountain, richly adorned with painting and sculpture, and, in point of size and brilliancy, rivalling the halls of living monarchs. In this, the "house of his glory," lie Pharaoh and his princes. Not only have the Egyptians, by the durable materials which they used in building, and the scale on which their public edifices were constructed, transmitted their temples to us—their very bodies themselves have come down to our day. The art of embalming, as is well known, was universally practised amongst them; and the consequence is, that we may see, at this day, the forms and features of the very men by whom these mighty fabrics were erected—men who lived four thousand years ago—the kings, the warriors, the sages, and the citizens of Egypt. After a slumber of many ages, their remains are as perfect as when they were newly laid in what were designed to be their last resting-places. But, alas! their bodies have been preserved only to be desecrated. Their tombs have been violated, and now their bones literally 'lie scattered about the grave's mouth;' while by some the mummies have been carried into lands far distant, and which, when these men lived, and for ages after, were altogether unknown. The common dwellings of Thebes, formed probably of brick, have utterly perished ages ago. They have left not a vestige, unless the mounds of earth around us can be regarded as such—a distinction to which we think they may lay claim. On these mounds, and especially adjoining the walls of the temples—looking all the meaner from their close proximity to the memorials of such unrivalled magnificence—are the mud huts of the few poor and miserable Arabs who inhabit the site, and who live mainly by digging into mummy pits, and selling the antiquities they discover to strangers. To such a base end has the mighty Thebes—"populous No"—come. "I will execute judgments in No"—"I will cut off the multitude of No"—"No shall be rent asunder," Eze. xxx. 14, 15, 16.—Wylie's Journey. 9. Ethiopia. The land of Cush, not far from No, or Thebes. See below. Egypt. Here taken for Lower Egypt, as distinguished from Upper, of which Thebes was itself the capital. Put. Part of Africa. Lubim. Libya. Or Ethiopia. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xviii., where the conversion of the Ethiopians is predicted. The same event is predicted in Ps. lxviii. 32; lxxxvii. 4; Isa. xlv. 14; Zep. iii. 10. 'Those,' says Gesenius, in his commentary on Ps. xviii., 'who take pleasure in tracing the fulfilment of such predictions in subsequent history, may find it in Acts viii. 27, (the conversion, both to Judaism and Christianity, of the women of queen Candace,) and still more in the circumstance that Abyssinia is to this day the only great Christian state in the eastern world.' Interesting details respecting the Abyssinian or Ethiopian church are given in recent works, especially Gobat's Abyssinia, and Harris's Highlands of Ethiopia, and in the Appendix to Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible. 'The adherents of the Abyssinian church,' says Dr. W., 'occupy the whole of the country marked in our maps as Abyssinia, with the exception of its outer parts on all sides, which are now occupied by heathen and Muhammadan tribes, which, till lately, were fast contracting its limits. Beyond the bounds of Habesh, on both sides of the river Gochob, too, it appears, from credible reports communicated to Sir William Harris during his late embassy to the country, there exist, in various quarters, isolated communities professing the Christianity of Ethiopia, who for a long period of years have successfully held their position among the mountain fastnesses in the very heart of the now pagan and Muhammadan country.'——'Making due allowance for the superstition and geographical ignorance of the various natives from whom the foregoing particulars have been collected, the fullest credit may be accorded,—minute cross-examinations of individuals, who could have held no previous communication with each other, having corroborated every point. It is important,' he adds, 'to know that the Gochob, in its upper course, is occupied by so powerful a Christian people, whose sovereign exercises over the destinies of the surrounding Gentiles an influence which, if properly directed, could be made to check the rapid spread of Islamism, instead of fostering the traffic in human beings.'—Harris's Highlands of Ethiopia. Dr. Wilson, referring to the earliest authentic notices of the conversion of Ethiopia to Christianity, mentions two Christian youths of Tyre who, whilst in captivity in Ethiopia, were made greatly instrumental, about the year 327 of our era, in accomplishing the change. At present Christianity exists in a most corrupted form in that country; and Dr. Wilson gives a most interesting narrative of two young men, natives of it, who have twice traversed the immense distance from Abyssinia to Bombay, in order to attend a Missionary institution there, and be more fitted to declare to their fellow-countrymen the gospel tidings. With this view, after a residence of several years at Bombay, they are about to return to their native land. 'Many, I trust,' adds their instructor, 'will lift their hearts unto God in fervent prayer in behalf of these youthful and beloved Ethiopian disciples, who have travelled so far, and suffered so much, that the work of their preparation for preaching the Gospel to their benighted countrymen may be completed; and that some herald of the cross may, in due time, be sent from the highly favoured lands of the west to "bear this heavy burden with them," and to strive with them mightily for the revival of the faith of the Gospel among the mountains of Africa, in which nominal Christianity has found for ages a refuge from the hate and persecution of the heathen and the followers of the false prophet.' ASSYRIAN CAVALRY.

AN

PROPHECY OF HABAKKUK,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It was a very foolish fancy of the Jewish rabbins that this prophet was the son of the Shunamite woman that was at first miraculously given and afterwards raised to life by Elisha, 2 Kin. iv., as they say also the prophet Jonah was the son of the widow of Zarephath, whom Elijah raised to life. It is a more probable conjecture of their modern chronologers that he lived and prophesied in the reign of king Manasseh, when wickedness abounded, and destruction was hastening on: destruction by the Chaldeans, whom this prophet mentions as the instruments of God's judgments; and Manasseh was himself carried to Babylon as an earnest of what should come afterwards. In the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon mention is made of Habakkuk the prophet in the land of Judah, that was carried thence by an angel into Babylon to feed Daniel in the den. Those who give credit to that story take pains to reconcile our prophet's living before the captivity, and foretelling it, with that. Huetius thinks that was another of the same name, a prophet—this of the tribe of Simeon, that of Levi; others, that he lived so long as to the end of the captivity, though he prophesied of it before it came; and some have imagined that Habakkuk's feeding Daniel in the den is to be understood mystically, that Daniel then lived by faith, as Habakkuk had said the just should do: he was fed by that word, ch. ii. 4. The prophecy of this book is a mixture of the prophet's addresses to God in the people's name, and to the people in God's name; for it is the office of the prophets to carry messages both ways; and we have in it a lively representation of the intercourse and communion that is between a gracious God and a gracious soul. The whole particularly refers to the invasion of the land of Judah by the Chaldeans, which brought spoil upon the people of God—a just puishment of the spoil they had been guilty of among themselves; but it is of general use, especially to help us through that great temptation with which good men have in all ages been exercised, arising from the power and prosperity of the wicked, and the sufferings of the righteous by it.

A.M. 3378. B.C. 626.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter, I. The prophet complains to God of the violence done by the abuse of the sword of justice among his own people, and the hardships thereby put upon many good people, ver. 1—4. II. God by him foretells the punishment of that abuse of power by the sword of war, and the desolations which the army of the Chaldeans should make upon them. ver. 5—11. III. Then the prophet complains of that too, and is grieved that the Chaldeans prevailed so far, ver. 12—17; so that he scarce knows which is more to be lamented, the sin or the punishment of it; for in both many harmless good people are very great sufferers. It is well there is a day of judgment and a future state before us, in which it shall be eternally well with all the righteous, and with them only, and ill with all the wicked, and them only; so the present seeming disorders of providence shall be set to rights, and there will remain no matter of complaint whatsoever.

THE burden which Habakkuk the prophet did see.

2 O LORD, how long shall I cry,
And thou wilt not hear!
Even cry out unto thee of violence,
And thou wilt not save!
3 Why dost thou shew me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance?
For spoiling and violence are before me:
And there are that raise up strife and contention.
4 Therefore the law is slacked,
And judgment doth never go forth:
For the wicked doth compass about the righteous;
Therefore wrong judgment proceedeth.

No more is told us in the title of this book, which we have, ver. 1, but that the penman was a prophet, a man Divinely inspired and commissioned, which is enough; if that be so, we need not ask concerning his tribe or family, or place of his birth; and that the book itself is "the burden" which he saw,—he was as sure of the truth of it as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes already accomplished. Here, in these verses, the prophet sadly laments the iniquity of the times, as one sensibly touched with grief for the lamentable decay of religion and righteousness. It is a very melancholy complaint which he here makes to God.

First. That no man could call what he had his own; but, in defiance of the most sacred laws of property and equity, he that had power on his side had what he had a mind to, though he had no right on his side. The land was full of violence, as the old world was, Gen. vi. 11; the prophet cries out of violence, ver. 2, iniquity and grievance, spoil and violence. In families and among relations, in neighbourhoods and among friends, in commerce and in courts of law, every thing was carried with a high hand, and no man made any scruple of doing wrong to his neighbour, so that he could but make a good hand of it for himself. It does not appear that the prophet himself had any great wrong done him,—in losing times it fared best with those that had nothing to lose; but it grieved him to see other people wronged, and he could not but mingle his tears with those of the oppressed. Note, Doing wrong to harmless people, as it is an iniquity in itself, so it is a great grievance to all that are concerned for God's Jerusalem, who sigh and cry for abominations of this kind. He complains, ver. 4, that "the wicked doth compass about the righteous." One honest man, one honest cause, shall have enemies besetting it on every side, many wicked men in confederacy against it to run it down; nay, one wicked man (for it is singular) with so many various arts of mischief sets upon a righteous man, that he perfectly besets him.

Secondly. That the kingdom was broken into parties and factions, that were continually biting and devouring one another. This is a lamentation to all the sons of peace, "There are that raise up strife and contention," ver. 3; that foment divisions, widen breaches, incense men against one another, and sow discord among brethren by doing the work of him that is the accuser of the brethren. Strifes and contentions that have been laid asleep, and begun to be forgotten, they awake, and industriously raise up again, and blow up the sparks that were hid under the embers; and if blessed be the peace makers, cursed are such peace breakers that make parties, and so make mischief that spreads farther and lasts longer than they can imagine. It is sad to see ill men warming their hands at those flames which are devouring all that is good in a nation, and stirring up the fire too.

Thirdly. That the torrent of violence and strife ran so strong as to bid defiance to the restraints and regulations of laws, and the administration of justice, ver. 4; because God did not appear against them nobody else would, therefore the law is slacked, is silent, it breathes not, its pulse beats not, (so it is said the word signifies,) it intermits, and judgment doth not go forth as it should; no cognizance is taken of those crimes, no justice done upon the criminals; nay, "wrong judgment proceedeth;" if appeals be made to the courts of equity, the righteous shall be condemned, and the wicked justified, so that the remedy proves the worst disease. The legislative power takes no care to supply the deficiencies of the law, for the obviating of those growing threatening mischiefs; the executive power takes no care to answer the good intentions of the laws that are made; the stream of justice is dried up by violence, and has not its free course.

Fourthly. That all this was open and public, and impudently avowed; it was barefaced. The prophet complains that this iniquity was shewed him; he beheld it which way soever he turned his eyes, nor could he look off it; "Spoiling and violence are before me." Note, The abounding of wickedness in a nation is a very great eyesore to good people, and if they did not see it they could not believe it to be so bad as it is. Solomon often complains of the vexation of this kind which he saw under the sun; and the prophet would therefore gladly turn hermit, that he might not see it, Jer. ix. 2. But "then we must needs go out of the world," which therefore we should long to do, that we may remove to that world where holiness and love reign eternally, and no spoiling and violence shall be before us.

Fifthly. That he complained of this to God, but could not obtain a redress of those grievances; Lord, saith he, "why dost thou shew me iniquity?" Why hast thou cast my lot in a time and place when and where it is to be seen, and why do I continue to sojourn in Mesech and Kedar? I cry to thee of this violence, I cry aloud, I have cried long, but "thou wilt not hear," "thou wilt not save," thou dost not take vengeance on the oppressors, nor do justice to the oppressed, as if thine arm were shortened, or thine ear heavy. When God seems to connive at the wickedness of the wicked, nay, and to countenance it, by suffering them to prosper in their wickedness, it shocks the faith of good men, and proves a sore temptation to them to say they have cleansed their hearts in vain, Ps. lxxiii. 13; and hardens those in their impiety who say, "God hath forsaken the earth." We must not think it strange if wickedness be suffered to prevail far, and prosper long; God has reasons, and we are sure they are good reasons, both for the reprieves of bad men and the rebukes of good men; and therefore, though we plead with him, and humbly expostulate concerning his judgments, yet we must say he is wise, and righteous, and good in all; and must believe the day will come, though it may be long deferred, when the cry of sin will be heard against those that do wrong, and the cry of prayer for those that suffer it.

5 Behold ye among the heathen, and regard,
And wonder marvellously:
For I will work a work in your days,
Which ye will not believe, though it be told you.
6 For, lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, that bitter and hasty nation,
Which shall march through the breadth of the land,
To possess the dwellingplaces that are not their's.
7 They are terrible and dreadful: [selves.
Their judgment and their dignity shall proceed of them-
8 Their horses also are swifter than the leopards,
And are more fierce than the evening wolves:
And their horsemen shall spread themselves,
And their horsemen shall come from far;
They shall fly as the eagle that hasteth to eat.
9 They shall come all for violence:
Their faces shall sup up as the east wind,
And they shall gather the captivity as the sand.
10 And they shall scoff at the kings,
And the princes shall be a scorn unto them:
They shall deride every strong hold;
For they shall heap dust, and take it.
11 Then shall his mind change,
And he shall pass over, and offend,
Imputing this his power unto his god.

We have here an answer to the prophet's complaint, giving him assurance that though God bore long, he would not bear always, with this provoking people; for the day of vengeance was in his heart, and he must tell them so, that they might by repentance and reformation turn away the judgment they were threatened with.

First. The preamble to the sentence is very awful; ver. 5, "Behold ye among the heathen, and regard." Since they will not be brought to repentance by the long-suffering of God, he will take another course with them. No resentments are so keen, so deep, as those of abused patience. The Lord will inflict upon them, 1. A public punishment; which shall be beheld and regarded among the heathen, which the neighbour nations shall take notice of, and stand amazed at: see Deu. xxix. 24, 25. This will aggravate the desolations of Israel, that they will thereby be made a spectacle to the world. 2. An amazing punishment; so strange and surprising, and so much out of the common road of providence, that it shall not be paralleled among the heathen, shall be sorer and heavier than what God has usually inflicted upon the nations that know him not; nay, it shall not be credited, even by those that had the prediction of it from God before it comes, or the report of it from those that were eyewitnesses of it; when it is come, you will not believe it, though it be told you. It will be thought incredible that so many judgments should combine in one, and every circumstance so strangely concur to enforce and aggravate it; that so great and potent a nation should be so reduced and broken, and that God should deal so severely with a people that had been taken into the bond of the covenant, and that he had done so much for. The punishment of God's professing people cannot but be the astonishment of all about them. 3. A speedy punishment; "I will work a work in your days;" now quickly. This generation shall not pass till the judgment threatened be accomplished. The sins of former days shall be reckoned for in your days, for now the measure of the iniquity is full, Mat. xxiii. 36. 4. It shall be a punishment in which much of the hand of God shall appear; it shall be a work of his own working, so that all who see it shall say, This is the Lord's doing; and it will be found a fearful thing to fall into his hands; woe to those whom he takes to task! 5. It shall be such a punishment as will typify the destruction to be brought upon the despisers of Christ and his Gospel; for to that these words are applied, Acts xiii. 41, "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish." The ruin of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for their idolatry, was a figure of their ruin by the Romans, for rejecting Christ and his Gospel, and it is a very marvellous thing, and almost incredible. Is there not a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity?

Secondly. The sentence itself is very dreadful and particular; ver. 6, "Lo, I raise up the Chaldeans." There were those that raised up a great deal of strife and contention among them, which was their sin; and now God will "raise up the Chaldeans" against them, who shall strive and contend with them, which shall be their punishment. Note, When God's professed people quarrel among themselves, snarl at, and devour one another, it is just with God to bring the common enemy upon them that shall make peace by making an universal devastation. The contending parties in Jerusalem were inveterate one against another, when the Romans came and took away their place and nation. The Chaldeans shall be the instruments of the destruction threatened, who though themselves acting unrighteously, yet shall "execute the righteousness of the Lord," and punish the unrighteousness of Israel. Now here we have,

1. A description of the people that shall be raised up against Israel, to be a scourge to them. 1st. They are a bitter and hasty nation, cruel and fierce, and what they do is done with violence and fury. They are precipitate in their counsels, vehement in their passions, and push on with resolution in their enterprises; they shew no mercy, and they spare no pains. Miserable is the case of those that are given up into the hand of those cruel ones. 2nd. They are strong, and therefore formidable, and such as there is no standing before, and yet no fleeing from; ver. 7, "They are terrible and dreadful," famed for the gallant troops they bring into the field; ver. 8, "Their horses are swifter than leopards," to charge and pursue, and "more fierce than the evening wolves;" and wolves are observed to be most ravenous towards the evening, after they have been kept hungry all day, waiting for that darkness under the protection of which "all the beasts of the forest creep forth," Ps. civ. 10. Their squadrons of horse shall be very numerous, "their horsemen shall spread themselves" a great way, for they shall "come from far," from all parts of their own country, and shall be dispersed into all parts of the country they invade, to plunder it, and enrich themselves with the spoil of it. And "in making speed to spoil, they shall hasten to the prey," as those, Isa. viii. 1, margin, for they shall "fly as the eagle" towards the earth, when she "hasteth to eat," and strikes at the prey she has an eye upon. 3rd. Their own will is a law to them, and in the fierceness of their pursuits they will not be governed by any laws of humanity, equity, or honour. "Their judgment and their dignity shall proceed of themselves," ver. 7. Appetite and passion rule them, and not reason or conscience; their principle is Quicquid libet, licet,—'My will is my law;' and Sic volo, sic jubeo; stat pro ratione voluntas,—'This is my wish, this is my command; it shall be done because I choose it.' What favour can be hoped for from such an enemy? Note, Those that have been unjust and unmerciful, among whom "the law is slacked, and judgment doth not go forth," will justly be paid in their own coin, and fall into the hands of those that will deal unjustly and unmercifully with them.

2. A prophecy of the terrible execution that should be made by this terrible nation. 'They shall march through the breadth of the earth,' so it may be read; for in a little time the Chaldean forces subdued all the nations in those parts, so that they seemed to have conquered the world; they overran Asia and part of Africa. Or, through the breadth of the land of Israel, which was wholly laid waste by them. It is here foretold, 1st. That they shall seize all as their own that they can lay their hands on. They shall come to "possess the dwelling-places that are not theirs," which they have no right to but that which their sword gives them. 2nd. That they shall push on the war with all possible vigour; "They shall all come for violence," ver. 9, not to determine any disputed right by the sword, but right or wrong, to enrich themselves with the spoil. "Their faces shall sup up as the east wind;" their very countenances shall be so fierce and frightful, that a look will serve to make them masters of all they have a mind to; so that they shall swallow up all, as the east wind nips and blasts the buds and flowers. 'Their faces looked towards the east,' so some read it; they shall still have an eye to their own country, which lay eastward from Judæa, and all the spoil they seize they shall remit thither. 3rd. That they shall take a vast number of prisoners, and send them into Babylon; "They shall gather the captivity as the sand" for multitude, and shall never know when they have enough, as long as there are any more to be had. 4th. They shall make nothing of the opposition that is given to them, ver. 10. Do the distressed Jews depend upon their great men to make a stand, and with their conduct and courage to give check to the victorious arms of the Chaldeans? Alas, they will make nothing of them. "They shall scoff," ('he' shall, so it is in the original, meaning Nebuchadnezzar, who, being puffed up with his successes, shall scoff,) "at the kings" and commanders of the forces that think to make head against him, and "the princes shall be a scorn to them," so unequal a match shall they appear to be. Do they depend upon their garrisons and fortified towns? "He shall deride every stronghold," for to him it shall be weak, and "he shall heap up dust and take it." A little soil thrown up for ramparts shall serve to give him all the advantage against them that he can desire; he shall make but a jest of them, and a sport of taking them. 5th. By all this he shall be puffed up with an intolerable pride, which shall be his destruction; ver. 11, "Then shall his mind change" for the worse. The spirit both of the people and of the king shall grow more haughty and insolent. Those that will not be content with their own rights, neither will they be content when they have made themselves masters of other people's rights too; but as the condition riseth, the mind riseth too. This victorious king shall pass over all the bounds of reason, and equity, and modesty, and break through all their bond, and thereby he shall offend, shall make God his enemy, and so prepare ruin for himself, by "imputing this his power unto his god," whereas he had it from the God of Israel. Bel and Necho were the gods of the Chaldeans, and to them they gave the glory of their successes, were hardened in their idolatry, and blasphemously argued that because they had conquered Israel their gods were too strong for the God of Israel. Note. It is a great offence (and the common offence of proud people) to take that glory to ourselves, or give it to gods of our own making, which is due to the living and true God only. These closing words of the sentence give a glimpse of comfort to the afflicted people of God; it is to be hoped they will change their minds and grow better, and ripen for deliverance, and they did so. However, their enemies will change their minds and grow worse, and ripen for destruction, which will inevitably come in God's due time, for a haughty spirit, lifted up against God, goes before a fall.

12 Art thou not from everlasting, O LORD my God, mine
We shall not die. [Holy One?
O LORD, thou hast ordained them for judgment;
And, O mighty God, thou hast established them for correction.
13 Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil,
And canst not look on iniquity: [ously,
Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacher-
And holdest thy tongue when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous than he?
14 And makest men as the fishes of the sea,
As the creeping things, that have no ruler over them?
15 They take up all of them with the angle,
They catch them in their net,

And gather them in their drag:
Therefore they rejoice and are glad.
16 Therefore they sacrifice unto their net,
And burn incense unto their drag;
Because by them their portion is fat,
And their meat plenteous.
17 Shall they therefore empty their net,
And not spare continually to slay the nations?

The prophet having received of the Lord that which he was to deliver to the people, now turns to God, and again addresseth himself to him, for the ease of his own mind under the burden which he saw. And still he is full of complaints; if he look about him, he sees nothing but violence done by Israel; if he look before him, he sees nothing but violence done against Israel; and it is hard to say which is the more melancholy sight. His thoughts of both he pours out before the Lord. It is our duty to be affected both with the iniquities and with the calamities of the church of God, and of the times and places wherein we live; but we must take heed lest we grow peevish in our resentments, and carry them too far, so as to entertain any hard thoughts of God, or lose the comfort of our communion with him. The world is bad, and always was so, and will be so; it is out of our power to mend it; but we are sure that God governs the world, and will bring glory to himself out of all, and therefore we must resolve to make the best of it, must be ourselves better, and long for the better world. The prospect of the prevalency of the Chaldeans drives the prophet to his knees, and he takes the liberty to plead with God concerning it. And in his plea we may observe,

First. The truths he lays down, which he resolves to abide by, and with which he endeavours to comfort himself and his friends under the growing, threatening power of the Chaldeans; and they will furnish us with pleasing considerations for our support in the like case.

1. However it be, yet God is the Lord our God, and our Holy One. The victorious Chaldeans impute their power to their idols, but we are taught to tell them that the "God of Israel is the true God, the living God," Jer. x. 10, 11. 1st. He is Jehovah, the fountain of all being, power, and perfection. Our Rock is not as theirs. 2nd. He is my God. He speaks in the people's name; every Israelite may say, He is mine; though we are thus sore broken, and all this is come upon us, yet have we not forgotten the name of our God, nor quitted our relation to him; yet have we not disowned him, nor hath he disowned us, Ps. xliv. 17. We are an offending people, he an offended God, yet he is ours, and we will not entertain any hard thoughts of him or of his service, for all this. 3rd. He is my Holy One, which intimates that the prophet loved God, as a holy God, loved him for the sake of his holiness; he is mine, because he is a Holy One, and therefore he will be my Sanctifier and my Saviour, because he is my Holy One. Men are unholy, but my God is holy.

2. Our God is from everlasting. This he pleads with him, "Art not thou from everlasting, O Lord my God?" It is a matter of great and continual comfort to God's people, under the troubles of this present life, that their God is from everlasting, which speaks, 1st. The eternity of his nature. If he is from everlasting, he will be to everlasting; and we must have recourse to this first principle, when things seen that are temporal are discouraging, that we have hope and help sufficient in a God that is not seen, that is eternal. Art thou not from everlasting, and then wilt thou not make bare thine everlasting arm, in pursuance of thine everlasting counsels, to make unto thyself an everlasting name? 2nd. The antiquity of his covenant. Art thou not from of old, a God in covenant with thy people, so some understand it; and hast thou not done great things for them in the days of old, which we have heard with our ears, and which our fathers have told us of; and art thou not the same God still that ever thou wast? Thou art God, and changest not.

3. While the world stands God will have a church in it. Thou art from everlasting, and then "we shall not die." The Israel of God shall not be extirpated, nor the name of Israel blotted out, though it may sometimes seem to be very near it; like the apostles, "chastened and not killed," 2 Cor. vi. 9; "chastened sore, but not delivered over to death," Ps. cxviii. 18. See how the prophet infers the perpetuity of the church from the eternity of God; for Christ hath said, "Because I live," and therefore as long as I live, "ye shall live also," Jno. xiv. 19. He is the Rock on which the church is so firmly built that the gates of hell shall not, cannot, prevail against it. "We shall not die."

4. Whatever the enemies of the church may do against her, it is according to the counsel of God, and is designed and directed for wise and holy ends. "Thou hast ordained them, thou hast established them." It was God that gave the Chaldeans their power, made them a formidable people, and in his counsel determined what they should do; nor had they any power against his Israel but what was given them from above. He gave them their commission "to take spoil and to take the prey," Isa. x. 6. Herein God appears a mighty God, that the power of mighty men is derived from him, and depends upon him, and is under his check; he saith concerning it, "Hitherto shall it come and no farther." They whom God ordains shall do no more than what God has ordained, which is a great comfort to God's suffering people. Men are in God's hand, the rod in his hand, Ps. xvii. 14; and he hath "ordained them for judgment," and for correction. God's people need correction, and deserve it; they must expect it, they shall have it; when wicked men are let loose against them, it is not for their destruction, that they may be ruined, but for their correction, that they may be reformed; they are not intended for a sword to cut them off, but a rod to drive out the foolishness that is found in their hearts; though they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so. It is matter of great comfort to us, in reference to the troubles and afflictions of the church, that, whatever mischief men design to them, God designs to bring good out of them, and we are sure his counsel shall stand.

5. Though the wickedness of the wicked may prosper for a while, yet God is a holy God, and doth not approve of that wickedness; ver. 13, "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil." The prophet observing how very vicious and impious the Chaldeans were, and yet what great success they had against God's Israel, found a temptation arising from it to say, that it was vain to serve God, and indifferent to him what men were; but he soon suppresses the thought, by having recourse to his first principle, that God is not, that he cannot be, the author or patron of sin; as he cannot do iniquity himself, so he is of purer eyes than to behold it, with any allowance or approbation. No, it is that abominable thing which the Lord hates; he sees all the sin that is committed in the world, and it is an offence to him, it is odious in his eyes, and those that commit it are thereby made obnoxious to his justice. There is in the nature of God an antipathy to those dispositions and practices that are contrary to his holy law; and though an expedient is happily found out for his being reconciled to sinners, yet he never will, or can be, reconciled to sin. And this principle we must resolve to abide by, though the dispensations of his providence may for a time, and in some instances, seem to be inconsistent with it. Note, God's connivance at sin must never be interpreted his giving countenance to it; for "he is not a God that has pleasure in wickedness," Ps. v. 4, 5. The iniquity which it is here said God doth not look upon, may be meant especially of the mischief done to God's people by their persecutors; though God sees cause to permit it, yet he doth not approve of it. So it agrees with that of Balaam, Num. xxiii. 21, "He hath not beheld iniquity against Jacob," nor seen, with allowance, "perverseness against Israel," which is very comfortable to the people of God in their afflictions by the rage of men, that they cannot infer God's anger from it. Though the instruments of their trouble hate them, it doth not therefore follow that God doth; nay, he loves them, and it is in love that he doth correct them.

Secondly. The grievances he complained of, and finds hard to reconcile with these truths. Since we are sure thou art a holy God, why have atheists temptation given them to question whether thou art so or no? "Wherefore lookest thou upon the Chaldeans, that deal treacherously" with thy people, and givest them success in their attempts upon us? Why dost thou suffer thy sworn enemies, that blaspheme thy name, to deal thus cruelly, thus perfidiously, with thy sworn subjects, that desire to fear thy name? What shall we say to this? This was a temptation to Job, Job xxi. 7; xxiv. 1; to David, Ps. lxxiii. 2, 3; to Jeremiah, Jer. xii. 1, 2.

1. That God permitted sin, and was patient with the sinners. He looked upon them, he saw all their wicked doings and designs, and did not restrain or punish them, but suffered them to speed in their purposes, to go on and prosper, and to carry all before them. Nay, his looking upon them intimates that he not only gave them no check or rebuke, but gave them encouragement and assistance, as if he smiled upon them, and favoured them. He held his tongue when they went on in their wicked courses, said nothing against them, gave no orders to stop them. "These things thou hast done, and I kept silence."

2. That his patience was abused, and because sentence against these evil works and workers was not executed speedily, therefore their hearts were the more "fully set in them to do evil."

1st. They were false and deceitful, and there was no credit to be given them, nor any confidence to be put in them. They deal treacherously: under colour of peace and friendship they prosecute and execute the most mischievous designs, and make no conscience of their word in any thing.

2nd. They hated and persecuted men because they were better than themselves, as Cain hated Abel because "his own works were evil and his brother's righteous." "The wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous than he," for that very reason, because he shames him; they have an ill-will to the image of God, and therefore devour good men, because they bear that image. Though many of the Jews were as bad as the Chaldeans themselves, and worse, yet there were those among them that were much more righteous, and yet were devoured by them.

3rd. They make no more of killing men than of catching fish. The prophet complains that, Providence having delivered up the weaker to be a prey to the stronger, they were in effect made "as the fishes of the sea," ver. 14. So they had been among themselves, preying upon one another, as the greater fishes do upon the lesser, ver. 3; and they were made so to the common enemy. They were as "creeping things," or swimming things, for the word is used for fish, Gen. i. 20, that have no ruler over them, either to restrain them from devouring one another or to protect them from being devoured by their enemies. They are given up to the Chaldeans as fish to the fishermen. Those proud oppressors make no conscience of killing them, any more than men do of pulling fish out of the water, so small account do they make of human lives. They make no difficulty of killing them, but do it with as much ease as men catch fish, that make no resistance, but are unguarded and unarmed, and it is rather a pastime than any pains to take them. They make no distinction among them, but all is fish that comes to their net; and they reckon every thing their own that they can lay their hands on. They have various ways of spoiling and destroying, as men have of taking fish. Some they "take up with the angle," ver. 15, one by one; others they catch in shoals and by wholesale in their net, and "gather them in their drag," their inclosing net. Such variety of methods have they to destroy those by whom they hope to enrich themselves.

4th. They gloried in what they got, and pleased themselves with it, though it was got dishonestly. "Their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous," they prosper in their oppression and fraud; they have a great deal and it is of the best; their land is good, and they have abundance of it. And therefore, First. They have a great complacency in themselves, and are very pleasant, they live merrily; ver. 15, "Therefore they rejoice and are glad," because their wealth is great, and their projects succeed for the increase of it, Job xxxi. 25. "Soul, take thine ease," Lu. xii. 19. Secondly. They have a great conceit of themselves, and are very much in love with themselves, and mighty admirers of their own ingenuity and conduct; they sacrifice to their own net, and burn incense to their own drag; they applaud themselves for having got so much money, though never so dishonestly. Note. There is a proneness in us to take the glory of our outward prosperity to ourselves, and to say, "My might and the power of my hands has gotten me this wealth," Deu. viii. 17. And this is idolizing ourselves, sacrificing to the drag-net because it is our own, which is as absurd a piece of idolatry as sacrificing to Neptune or Dagon. That which makes them adore their net thus is because by it their portion is fat. They that make a god of their money will make a god of their drag-net, if they can but get money by it.

Thirdly. The prophet in the close humbly expresseth his hope that God will not suffer these destroyers of mankind always to go on and prosper thus, and expostulates with God concerning it; ver. 17, "Shall they therefore empty their net?" Shall they enrich themselves, and fill their own vessels, with that which they have by violence and oppression taken away from their neighbour? Shall they empty their net of what they have caught, that they may cast it into the sea again to catch more? And wilt thou suffer them to proceed in this wicked course? Shall they not "spare continually to slay the nations?" Must the numbers and wealth of nations be sacrificed to their net? As if it were a small thing to rob men of their estates, shall they rob God of his glory? Is not God the king of nations? And will he not assert their injured rights? Is he not jealous for his own honour, and will he not maintain that? The prophet lodgeth the matter in God's hand, and leaves it with him, as the Psalmist doth, Ps. lxxiv. 22, "Arise, O God, plead thine own cause."

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have an answer expected by the prophet, ver. 1, and returned by the Spirit of God, to the complaints which the prophet made of the violences and victories of the Chaldeans in the close of the foregoing chapter. The answer is, I. That after God hath served his own purposes by the prevailing power of the Chaldeans, has tried the faith and patience of his people, and distinguished between the hypocrites and the sincere among them, he will reckon with the Chaldeans, will humble and bring down, not only that proud monarch, Nebuchadnezzar, but that proud monarchy, for their boundless and insatiable thirst after dominion and wealth, for which they themselves should at length be made a prey, ver. 2—8. II. That not they only, but all other sinners like them, should perish under a Divine woe: 1. Those that are covetous, are greedy of wealth and honours, ver. 9—11; 2. Those that are injurious and oppressive, and raise estates by wrong and rapine, ver. 12—14; 3. Those that promote drunkenness, that they may expose their neighbours to shame, ver. 15—17; 4. Those that worship idols, ver. 18—20.

I WILL stand upon my watch,
And set me upon the tower,
And will watch to see what he will say unto me,
And what I shall answer when I am reproved.
2 And the LORD answered me, and said,
Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables,
That he may run that readeth it.
3 For the vision is yet for an appointed time,
But at the end it shall speak, and not lie:
Though it tarry, wait for it;
Because it will surely come, it will not tarry.
4 Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him:
But the just shall live by his faith.

Here, First. The prophet humbly gives his attendance upon God; ver. 1, "I will stand upon my watch," as a sentinel on the walls of a besieged city, or in the borders of an invaded country, that is very solicitous to gain intelligence. I will look up, will look round, will look within, and "watch to see what he will say unto me," will listen attentively to the words of his mouth, and carefully observe the steps of his providence, that I may not lose the least hint of instruction or direction. "I will watch to see what he will say in me,' so it may be read, what the spirit of prophecy in me will dictate to me by way of answer to my complaints. And even in an ordinary way God not only speaks to us by his word, but speaks in us by our own consciences whispering to us, This is the way, walk in it; and we must attend to the voice of God in both. The prophet's standing upon his tower or high place speaks his prudence, in making use of the helps and means he had within his reach to know the mind of God, and to be instructed concerning it. Those that expect to hear from God must withdraw from the world, and get above it, must raise their attention, fix their thought, study the Scriptures, consult experiences and the experienced, and continue instant in prayer, and thus set themselves upon the tower. His standing upon his watch speaks his patience, his constancy and resolution; he will wait the time, and weather the point, as a watchman doth, but he will have an answer; he will know what God will say to him, not only for his own satisfaction, but to enable him, as a prophet, to give satisfaction to others, and answer their exceptions when he is reproved or argued with. Herein the prophet is an example to us,

1. When we are tossed and perplexed with doubts concerning the methods of providence, are tempted to think it is fate or fortune, and not a wise God, that governs the world, or that the church is abandoned, and God's covenant with his people cancelled and laid aside, then we must take pains to furnish ourselves with considerations proper to clear this matter; we must stand upon our watch against the temptation, that it may not get ground upon us; must set ourselves upon the tower, to see if we can discover that which will silence the temptation, and solve the objected difficulties; must do as the psalmist, "consider the days of old," and make a "diligent search," Ps. lxxvii. 6; must "go into the sanctuary of God," and there labour to understand the end of these things, Ps. lxxiii. 17. We must not give way to our doubts, but struggle to make the best of our way out of them.

2. When we have been at prayer, pouring out our complaints and requests before God, we must carefully observe what answers God gives by his word, his Spirit, and his providences, to our humble representations. When David saith, "I will direct my prayer unto thee," as an arrow to the mark, he adds, "I will look up," will look after my prayer, as a man doth after the arrow he hath shot, Ps. v. 3. We must "hear what God the Lord will speak," Ps. lxxxv. 8.

3. When we go to read and hear the word of God, and so to consult the lively oracles, we must set ourselves to observe what God will thereby say unto us to suit our case, what word of conviction, caution, counsel, and comfort he will bring to our souls, that we may receive it, and submit to the power of it, and may consider what we shall answer, what returns we shall make to the word of God, when we are reproved by it.

4. When we are attacked by such as quarrel with God and his providence, as the prophet here seems to have been, beset, besieged as in a tower, by hosts of objectors, we should consider how to answer them, fetch our instructions from God, hear what he saith to us for our satisfaction, and have that ready to say to others, when we are reproved, to satisfy them, as a "reason of the hope that is in us," 1 Pet. iii. 15, and beg of God a mouth and wisdom, and that it may be "given us in that same hour what we shall speak."

Secondly. God graciously gives him the meeting, for he will not disappoint the believing expectations of his people, that wait to hear what he will say unto them, but will speak peace, will "answer them with good words and comfortable words," Zec. i. 13. The prophet had complained of the prevalency of the Chaldeans which God had given him a prospect of; now, to pacify him concerning it, he here gives him a farther prospect of their fall and ruin, as Isaiah before this, when he had foretold the captivity in Babylon, foretold also the destruction of Babylon. Now, this great and important event being made known to him by a vision, care is taken to publish the vision, and transmit it to the generations to come, who should see the accomplishment of it.

1. The prophet must "write the vision," ver. 2. Thus, when St. John had a vision of the New Jerusalem, he was ordered to write, Rev. xxi. 5. He must write it, that he might imprint it on his own mind, and make it more clear to himself, but especially that it might be notified to those in distant places, and transmitted to those in future ages. What is handed by tradition is easily mistaken, and liable to corruption; but what is written is reduced to a certainty, and preserved safe and pure. We have just reason to bless God for written visions, that God has written to us the great things of his prophets, as well as of his law. He must "write the vision, and make it plain upon tables," must write it legibly, in large characters, so that he that runs may read it; that those who will not allow themselves leisure to read it deliberately may not avoid a cursory view of it. Probably the prophets were wont to write some of the most remarkable of their predictions in tables, and to hang them up in the temple, Isa. viii. 1. Now the prophet is bid to write this very plain. Note, Those that are employed in preaching the word of God should study plainness as much as may be, so as to make them intelligible to the meanest capacities. The things of our everlasting peace, which God has written to us, are "made plain, they are all plain to him that understandeth," Pr. viii. 9, and they are published with authority; God himself has prefixed his imprimatur to them; he hath said, Make them plain.

2. The people must wait for the accomplishment of the vision; ver. 3, "The vision is yet for an appointed time" to come. You shall now be told of your deliverance by the breaking of the Chaldeans' power, and that the time of it is fixed in the council and decree of God; "There is an appointed time," but it is not near, it is yet to be deferred a great while; and that comes in here as a reason why it must be written, that it may be reviewed afterwards, and the event compared with it. Note, God has an appointed time for his appointed work, and will be sure to do the work when the time comes; and it is not for us to anticipate his appointments, but to wait his time. And it is a great encouragement to wait with patience, that, though the promised favour be deferred long, it will come at last, and be an abundant recompence to us for our waiting. "At the end it shall speak, and not lie;" we shall not be disappointed of it, for it will come at the time appointed, nor shall we be disappointed in it, for it will fully answer our believing expectations. The promise may seem silent a great while, but at the end it shall speak; and therefore, though it tarry longer than we expected, yet we must continue waiting for it, being assured it will come, and willing to tarry till it doth come. The day that God hath set for the deliverance of his people, and the destruction of his and their enemies, is a day, 1st. That will surely come at last; it is never adjourned sine die,—'without fixing another day,' but it will without fail come at the fixed time and the fittest time. 2nd. It will not tarry; for God "is not slack, as some count slackness," 2 Pet. iii. 9. Though it tarry past our time, yet it doth not tarry past God's time, which is always the best time.

3. This vision, the accomplishment of which is so long waited for, will be such an exercise of faith and patience as will try and discover men what they are, ver. 4. 1st. There are some who will proudly disdain this vision, whose hearts are so lifted up that they scorn to take notice of it. If God will work for them presently they will thank him, but they will not give him credit; their hearts are lifted up towards vanity, and since God puts them off they will shift for themselves, and not be beholden to him. They think their own hands sufficient for them, and God's promise is to them an insignificant thing. That man's soul that is thus lifted up is not upright in him; he is not right with God, is not as he should be. Those that either distrust or despise God's all-sufficiency will not walk uprightly with him, Gen. xvii. 1. But, 2nd. Those that are truly good, and whose hearts are upright with God, will value the promise, and venture their all upon it; and in confidence of the truth of it will keep close to God and duty in the most difficult, trying times, and will then live comfortably in communion with God, dependence on him, and expectation of him. "The just shall live by faith," that is, during the captivity. Good people shall support themselves, and live comfortably by faith in these precious promises, while the performance of them is deferred. "The just shall live by his faith," by that faith which he acts upon the word of God. This is quoted in the New Testament, Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11; Heb. x. 38, for the proof of the great doctrine of justification by faith only, and of the influence which the grace of faith has upon the Christian life. Those that are made just by faith shall live, shall be happy here and for ever; and while they are here they live by it: when they come to heaven faith shall be swallowed up in vision.

5 Yea also, because he transgresseth by wine,
He is a proud man, neither keepeth at home,
Who enlargeth his desire as hell,
And is as death, and cannot be satisfied,
But gathereth unto him all nations,
And heapeth unto him all people:
6 Shall not all these take up a parable against him,
And a taunting proverb against him and say,
Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his!
How long?
And to him that ladeth himself with thick clay!
7 Shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee,
And awake that shall vex thee,
And thou shalt be for booties unto them?
8 Because thou hast spoiled many nations,
All the remnant of the people shall spoil thee;
Because of men's blood, and for the violence
Of the land, of the city, and of all that dwell therein.
9 Woe to him that coveteth an evil covetousness to his house,
That he may set his nest on high,
That he may be delivered from the power of evil!
10 Thou hast consulted shame to thy house by cutting off many people,
And hast sinned against thy soul.
11 For the stone shall cry out of the wall,
And the beam out of the timber shall answer it.
12 Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood,
And stablisheth a city by iniquity!
13 Behold, is it not of the LORD of hosts
That the people shall labour in the very fire,
And the people shall weary themselves for very vanity?
14 For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD,
As the waters cover the sea.

The prophet, having had orders to write the vision, and the people to wait for the accomplishment of it, the vision itself follows; and it is, as divers other prophecies we have met with, the burden of Babylon and Babylon's king, the same that was said to "pass over, and offend," ch. i. 11. It reads the doom, some think, of Nebuchadnezzar, who was principally active in the destruction of Jerusalem, or of that monarchy, or of the whole kingdom of the Chaldeans, or of all such proud and oppressive powers that bear hard upon any people, especially upon God's people. Observe,

First. The charge laid down against this enemy, upon which the sentence is grounded, ver. 5. The lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life, are the entangling snares of men, and great men especially; and we find him that led Israel captive himself led captive by each of these. For, 1. He is sensual and voluptuous, and given to his pleasures. He transgresseth by wine; drunkenness is itself a transgression, and is the cause of abundance of transgression. We read of those that err through wine, Isa. xxviii. 7. Belshazzar, in whom particularly this prophecy had its accomplishment, was in the height of his transgression by wine when the handwriting upon the wall signed the warrant for his immediate execution, pursuant to this sentence, Dan. v. 1. 2. He is haughty and imperious. He is a proud man, and his pride is a certain presage of his fall coming on. If great men be proud men the great God will make them know he is above them. His transgression by wine is made a cause of his arrogance and insolence; therefore he is a proud man. When a man is drunk, though he makes himself as mean as a beast, yet he thinks himself as great as a king, and prides himself in that by which he shames himself. We find the crown of pride upon the head of the drunkards of Ephraim, and a woe to both, Isa. xxviii. 1. 3. He is covetous and greedy of wealth, and this is the effect of his pride. He thinks himself worthy to enjoy all, and therefore makes it his business to engross all. The Chaldean monarchy aimed to be an universal one. He keepeth not at home; is not content with his own, which he has an incontestable title to, but thinks it too little, and so enjoys it not, nor takes the comfort he might in his own palace, in his own dominion; his sin is his punishment, and his ambition his perpetual uneasiness. Though the home be a palace, yet to a discontented mind it is a prison. He enlargeth his desires as hell, or the grave, that daily receives the bodies of the dead, and yet still cries, Give, give. He is as death, which continues to devour, and cannot be satisfied. Note, It is the sin and folly of many that have a great deal of the wealth of this world that they do not know when they have enough, but the more they have the more they would have, and the more eager they are for it. And it is just with God that the desires that are insatiable should still be unsatisfied; it is the doom passed on those that love silver that they shall never be satisfied with it, Eccl. v. 10. They that will not be content with their allotments shall not have the comfort of their achievements. This proud prince is still gathering to him all nations, and heaping to him all people, invading their rights, seizing their properties, and they must not be unless they will be his, and under his command. One nation will not satisfy him unless he has another, and then another, and all at last; as those in a lower sphere, to gratify the same inordinate desire, lay house to house, and field to field, that they may be placed alone in the earth, Isa. v. 8. And it is hard to say which is more to be pitied, the folly of such ambitious princes, that place their honour in enlarging their dominions, and not in ruling them well, or the misery of those nations that are harassed and pulled to pieces by them.

Secondly. The sentence passed upon him; ver. 6, "Shall not all these take up a parable against him?" His doom is, 1. That since pride has been his sin, disgrace and dishonour shall be his punishment, and he shall be loaded with contempt, shall be laughed at and despised by all about him, as those that look big and aim high deserve to be, and commonly are, when they are brought down and baffled. 2. That since he has been abusive to his neighbours, those very persons whom he has abused shall be the instruments of his disgrace; "All those shall take up a taunting proverb against him." They shall have the pleasure of insulting over him, and he the shame of being trampled upon by them. Those that shall triumph in the fall of this great tyrant are here furnished with a parable and a taunting proverb, to take up against him. He shall say, he that draws up the insulting ditty shall say thus: Ho, he "that increaseth that which is not his!" Aha! what has gone with him now? So it may be read in a taunting way. Or, He shall say, that is, the just that lives by his faith, he to whom the vision is written and made plain, with the help of that, he shall say this; shall foretell the enemy's fall, even when he sees him flourishing, and suddenly curse his habitation, even when he is taking root, Job v. 3. He shall indeed denounce woes against him.

1st. Here is a woe against him for increasing his own possessions by invading his neighbours' rights, ver. 6—8. He "increaseth that which is not his," but other people's. Note, No more of what we have is to be reckoned ours but what we came honestly by; nor will it long be ours, for wealth gotten by vanity will be diminished. Let not those that thrive in the world be too forward to bless themselves in it, for if they do not thrive lawfully they are under a woe. See here, First. What this prosperous prince is doing. He is "lading himself with thick clay." Riches are but clay, thick clay; what is gold and silver but white and yellow earth? They that travel through thick clay are both retarded and dirtied in their journey; so are they that go through the world in the midst of an abundance of the wealth of it. But, as if that were not enough, what fools are they that load themselves with it, as if the trash would be their treasure. They burden themselves with continual care about it, with a great deal of guilt in getting, saving, and spending it, and with a heavy account which they must give of it another day. They overload their ship with this thick clay, and so sink it and themselves into destruction and perdition. Secondly. See what people say of him, while he is thus increasing his wealth. They cry, How long? how long will it be ere he has enough? They cry to God, How long wilt thou suffer this proud oppressor to trouble the nations? Or they say to one another, See how long it will last, how long he will be able to keep what he gets thus dishonestly. They dare not speak out, but we know what they mean when they say, How long? Thirdly. See what it will be in the end hereof. What he has got by violence from others, others shall take by violence from him. The Medes and Persians shall make a prey of the Chaldeans, as they had done of other nations, ver. 7, 8. There shall be those that will bite thee and vex thee; they, from whom thou didst not fear any danger, that seemed asleep, shall rise up and awake to be a plague to thee. They shall rise up suddenly, when thou art most secure, and least prepared to receive the shock and ward off the blow; "Shall they not rise up suddenly?" No doubt they shall, and thou thyself hast reason to expect it, to be dealt with as thou hast dealt with others; that "thou shalt be for booties unto them," as others have been unto thee; that according to the law of retaliation, as "thou hast spoiled many nations," so thou shouldest thyself be spoiled; ver. 8, "All the remnant of the people shall spoil thee." The king of Babylon thought he had brought all the nations round about him so low that none of them should have been able to make reprisals upon him: but though they were but a remnant of people, a very few left, yet these shall be sufficient to spoil him, when God hath such a controversy with him, 1*st.* For men's blood, and the thousands of lives that have been sacrificed to his ambition and revenge, especially for the blood of Israelites, which is in a special manner precious to God. 2*nd.* For the violence of the land. His laying waste so many countries, and destroying the fruits of the earth, especially in the land of Israel. 3*rd.* For the "violence of the city," the many cities that he had turned into ruinous heaps, especially Jerusalem, the holy city, and of all that dwelt therein, who were ruined by him. Note, The violence done by proud men to greaten and enrich themselves will be called over again, and must be accounted for, another day, by him to whom vengeance belongs.

2nd. Here is a woe against him for coveting still more, and aiming to be still higher, ver. 9—11. The crime for which this woe is denounced is much the same with that in the foregoing article, an insatiable desire of wealth and honour; it is "coveting an evil covetousness to his house," that is, grasping at an abundance for his family. Note, Covetousness is a very evil thing in a family; it brings disquiet and uneasiness into it; "He that is greedy of gain troubles his own house," and, which is worse, it brings the curse of God upon it, and upon all the affairs of it. 'Woe to him that gaineth an evil gain,' so the margin reads it. There is a lawful gain which, by the blessing of God, may be a comfort to a house, a good man leaves an inheritance to his children's children; but what is got by fraud and injustice is ill got, and will be ill gain, will not only do no good to a family, but will bring poverty and ruin upon it. Now observe, First. What this covetous wretch aims at. It is "to set his nest on high," to raise his family to some greater dignity than it had before arrived at; or to set it, as he apprehends, out of the reach of danger, that he may be "delivered from the power of evil;" that it may not be in the power of the worst of his enemies to do him a mischief, or so much as to disturb his repose. Note, It is common for men to pretend it as an excuse for their covetousness and ambition, that they only consult their own safety, and aim to secure themselves. And yet they do but deceive themselves, when they think their wealth will be a strong city to them, and a high wall, for it is so only in their own conceit, Pr. xviii. 10. Secondly. What he will get by it. "Thou hast consulted," not safety, but "shame to thy house, by cutting off many people," ver. 10. Note, An estate raised by iniquity is a scandal to a family. Those that cut off or undermine others to make room for themselves, that impoverish others to enrich themselves, do but consult shame to their houses, and fasten upon them a mark of infamy. Yet that is not the worst of it; "Thou hast sinned against thy own soul," hast brought that under guilt and wrath, and endangered that. Note, Those that do wrong to their neighbour do a much greater wrong to their own souls. But if the sinner pleads not guilty, and thinks he has managed his frauds and violence with so much art and contrivance that they cannot be proved upon him, let him know that, if there be no other witnesses against him, "the stone shall cry out of the wall" against him, and the "beam out of the timber" in the roof "shall answer it," shall second it, shall witness it, that the money and materials wherewith he built the house were unjustly gotten, ver. 10. The stones and timber cry to heaven for vengeance, as the whole creation groans under the sin of man, and waits to be delivered from that bondage of corruption.

3rd. Here is a woe against him for building a town and a city by blood and extortion, ver. 12. He builds a town, and is himself lord of it; he stablisheth a city and makes it his royal seat: so Nebuchadnezzar did, Dan. iv. 30, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom?" But it is built with the blood of his own subjects, whom he has oppressed, and the blood of his neighbours, whom he hath unjustly invaded; it is "established by iniquity," by the unrighteous laws that are made for the security of it. Woe to him that doth so; for the towns and cities thus built can never be established, they will fall, and their founders be buried in the ruins of them. Babylon, that was built by blood and iniquity, did not continue long, its day soon came to fall; and then this woe took effect when that prophecy, which is expressed as a history, (Isa. xxi. 9,) proved a history indeed, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." And the destruction of that city was, First. The shame of the Chaldeans, who had taken so much pains, and were at such a vast expense, to fortify it; ver. 13, "Is it not of the Lord of hosts that the people," who have laboured so hard to defend that city, shall "labour in the very fire," shall see the outworks, which they confided in the strength of, set on fire, and shall labour in vain to save them? Or they, in their pursuit of worldly wealth and honour, put themselves to a great fatigue, and ran a mighty hazard, as they that labour in the fire do. The worst that can be said of the labourers in God's vineyard is, that "they have borne the burden and heat of the day," Mat. xx. 12; but those that are eager in their worldly pursuits labour in the very fire, make themselves perfect slaves to their lusts. There is not a greater drudge in the world than he that is under the power of reigning covetousness. And what comes of it? Though they take a world of pains they are but poorly paid for it, for after all "they weary themselves for very vanity;" they were told it was vanity, and when they find themselves disappointed of it, and disappointed in it, they will own it is worse than vanity, it is vexation of spirit. Secondly. It was the honour of God, as a God of impartial justice and irresistible power; for by the ruin of the Chaldean monarchy, (which all the world could not but take notice of,) "the earth was filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord," ver. 14; "The Lord is known by these judgments which he executeth, especially when he is pleased to look upon proud men and abase them;" for he thereby proves himself to be God alone, Job xl. 11, 12. See what good God brings out of the staining and sinking of earthly glory; he thereby manifests and magnifies his own glory, and fills the earth with the knowledge of it, as plentifully as the waters cover the sea, which lie deep, spread far, and shall not be dried up till time shall be no more. Such is the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, given by the Gospel, 2 Cor. iv. 6, and such was the knowledge of his glory by the miraculous ruin of Babylon. Note, Such as will not be taught the knowledge of God's glory by the judgments of his mouth shall be made to know and acknowledge it by the judgments of his hand.

15 Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink,
That puttest thy bottle to him, and makest him drunken
That thou mayest look on their nakedness! [also,
16 Thou art filled with shame for glory:
Drink thou also, and let thy foreskin be uncovered:
The cup of the LORD's right hand shall be turned unto
And shameful spewing shall be on thy glory. [thee,
17 For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee,
And the spoil of beasts, which made them afraid,
Because of men's blood, and for the violence
Of the land, of the city, and of all that dwell therein.
18 What profiteth the graven image that the maker thereof hath graven it;
The molten image, and a teacher of lies,

That the maker of his work trusteth therein, to make dumb idols?

19 Woe unto him that saith to the wood, Awake;
To the dumb stone, Arise, it shall teach!
Behold, it is laid over with gold and silver,
And there is no breath at all in the midst of it.

20 But the LORD is in his holy temple:
Let all the earth keep silence before him.

The three foregoing articles, upon which the woes here are grounded, are very near akin to each other. The criminals charged by them are oppressors and extortioners, that raise estates by rapine and injustice; and it is mentioned here again, ver. 17, the very same that was said ver. 8, for that is the crime upon which the greatest stress is laid. It is because of men's blood, innocent blood, barbarously and unjustly shed, which is a provoking, crying thing; it is "for the violence of the land, of the city, and of all that dwell therein," which God will certainly reckon for, sooner or later, as the asserter of right and the avenger of wrong. But here are two articles more of a different nature, which carry a "woe" to all those in general to whom they belong, and particularly to the Babylonian monarchs by whom the people of God were taken and held captives.

First. The promoters of drunkenness stand here impeached and condemned. Belshazzar was one of those; he was so remarkably that very night that the prophecy of this chapter was fulfilled in the period of his life and kingdom, when he drank wine before a thousand of his lords, Dan. v. 1, began the healths, and forced them to pledge him. And perhaps it was one reason why the succeeding monarchs of Persia made it a law of their kingdom that "in drinking none should compel," but "they should do according to every man's pleasure," as we find, Est. i. 8; because they had seen in the kings of Babylon the mischievous consequences of forcing healths, and making people drunk. But the woe here stands firm and very fearful against all those, whoever they be, that at any time are guilty of this sin, and in any place, from the stately palace (where that was) to the paltry alehouse. Observe,

1. Who the sinner is that is here articled against. It is he "that maketh his neighbour drunk," ver. 15. To give a neighbour drink that is in want, that is thirsty and poor, though it be but a cup of cold water to a disciple, in the name of a disciple,—to give drink to a weary traveller,—nay, and to give strong drink to him that is ready to perish, and wine to them that are heavy of heart,—is a piece of charity which is required of us, and shall be recompensed to us. "I was thirsty, and you gave me drink." But to give a neighbour drink that has enough already, and more than enough, with design to intoxicate him, that he may expose himself, may talk foolishly, and make himself ridiculous, may disclose his own privacies, or be drawn in to agree to an ill bargain for himself,—this is abominable wickedness, and those that are guilty of it, that make a practice of it, and take a pride and pleasure in it, are rebels against God in heaven, and his sacred laws, factors for the devil in hell, and his cursed interests, and enemies to men on earth, and their honour and welfare; they are like the son of Nebat, that "sinned and made Israel to sin." To entice others to drunkenness, to put the bottle to them, that they may be allured to it by its charms, by "looking on the wine when it is red and gives its colour in the cup," or to force them to it, obliging them by the rules of the club (and club laws indeed they are) to drink so many glasses, and so filled, is to do what we can, and perhaps more than we know of, towards the murder both of soul and body; and those that do so have a great deal to answer for.

2. What the sentence is that is here passed upon him. There is a "woe" to him, ver. 15, and a punishment, ver. 16, that shall answer the sin. 1st. Doth he put the cup of drunkenness into the hand of his neighbour? The cup of fury, the cup of trembling, the cup of the Lord's right hand shall be turned unto him; the power of God shall be armed against him; that cup which had gone round among the nations, to make them "a desolation, an astonishment and a hissing," which had made them stumble and fall, so that they could rise no more, shall at length be put into the hand of the king of Babylon, as was foretold, Jer. xxv. 15, 16, 18, 26, 27. Thus the New Testament Babylon, which had made the nations drunk with the cup of her fornications, shall have blood given her "to drink, for she is worthy," Rev. xviii. 3, 6. 2nd. Doth he take a pleasure in putting his neighbour to shame? He shall himself be loaded with contempt; "Thou art filled with shame for glory," with shame instead of glory, or art filled now with shame more than ever thou wast with glory, and the glory thou hast been filled with shall but serve to make thy shame the more grievous to thyself, and the more ignominious in the eyes of others. "Thou also shalt drink" of the cup of trembling, and shalt expose thyself by thy fear and cowardice, which shall be as the "uncovering of thy nakedness," to thy shame; and all about thee shall load thee with disgrace, for "shameful spewing shall be on thy glory," on that which thou hast most prided thyself in, thy dignity, wealth, and dominion; those whom thou hast made drunk shall themselves spew upon it. For, ver. 17, "The violence of Lebanon shall cover thee, and the spoil of beasts;" that is, thou shalt be hunted and run down with as much violence as ever any wild beasts in Lebanon were, shall be spoiled as they are, and thy fall made a sport of; for thou art as one of the beasts that made them afraid, and therefore they triumph when they have got the mastery of thee. Or, it is because of the violence thou hast done to Lebanon, that is, the land of Israel, Deu. iii. 25, and the temple, Zec. xi. 1, that God now reckons with thee; that is the sin that now covers thee.

Secondly. The promoters of idolatry stand here impeached and condemned; and this also was a sin that Babylon was notoriously guilty of,—it was the mother of harlots. Belshazzar in his revels praised his idols. And for this here is a woe against them, and in them against all others that do likewise, particularly the New Testament Babylon. Now see here,

1. What they do to promote idolatry. They are mad upon their idols; so the Chaldeans are said to be, Jer. l. 38. For, 1st. They have a great variety of idols, their graven images and molten images, that people may take their choice which they like best. 2nd. They are very nice and curious in the framing of them. The maker of the work has played his part admirably well, the fashioner of his fashion, so it is in the margin, that contrived the model in the most significant manner. 3rd. They are at great expense in beautifying and adorning them; "They lay them over with gold and silver." Because they are things people love and doat upon wherever they meet with them, they dress up their idols in them, the more effectually to court the adoration of the children of this world. 4th. They have great expectations from them; "The maker of the work trusteth therein" as his god, puts a confidence in it, and gives honour to it as his god. The worshippers of God give honour to him by offering up their prayers to him, and waiting to receive instructions and directions from him; and these honours they give to their idols. First. They pray to them; "They say unto the wood, Awake" for our relief, awake to hear our prayers; and "to the dumb stone, Arise," and save us, as the church prays to her God, Awake, O Lord, arise, Ps. xliv. 23. They own their image to be a god by praying to it; "Deliver me, for thou art my god," Isa. xliv. 17. Deos qui rogat ille facit,—'that to which a man addresses petitions is to him a god.' Secondly. They consult them as oracles, and expect to be directed and dictated to by them; "They say to the dumb stone," though it cannot speak, yet "it shall teach." What the wicked demon, or no less wicked priest, speaks to them from the image they receive with the utmost veneration, as of Divine authority, and are ready to be governed by it. Thus is idolatry planted and propagated under the specious show of religion and devotion.

2. How the extreme folly of this is exposed. God, by Isaiah, when he foretold the deliverance of his people out of Babylon, largely shewed the shameful stupidity and sottishness of idolaters, and so he doth here by the prophet on the like occasion. 1st. Their images, when they have made them, are but mere matter, which is the meanest, lowest rank of being; and all the expense they are at upon them cannot advance them one step above that. They are wholly void both of sense and reason, lifeless and speechless; it is a dumb idol, a dumb stone, and there is "no breath at all in the midst of it," so that the most minute animal that has but breath and motion is more excellent than they. They have not so much as the spirit of a beast. 2nd. It is not in their power to do their worshippers any good; ver. 8, "What profiteth the graven image?" Though it be mere matter, if it were cast into some other form it might be serviceable to some purpose or other of human life; but, as it is made a god of, it is of no profit at all, nor can do their worshippers the least kindness; nay, 3rd. It is so far from profiting them that it puts a cheat upon them, and keeps them under the power of a strong delusion. They say it shall teach; but it is a teacher of lies, for it represents God as having a body, as being finite, visible, and dependent, whereas he is a Spirit, infinite, invisible, and independent; and confirms those that become vain in their imaginations in the false notions they have of God, and make the idea of God to be a precarious thing, and what every man pleaseth. If we may say to the "works of our hands, Ye are our gods," we may say so to any of the creatures of our own fancy, though the chimera be never so extravagant. An image is a doctrine of vanities, it is falsehood, and a work of errors, Jer. x. 8, 14, 15. It is therefore easy to see what their religion is, and what they aim at, who recommend those teachers of lies as laymen's books, which they are to study and govern themselves by, when they have locked up from them the book of the Scriptures in an unknown tongue.

3. How the people of God triumph in him, and therewith support themselves, when the idolaters thus shame themselves; ver. 20, "But the Lord is in his holy temple." 1st. Our rock is not as their rock, Deu. xxxii. 31. Theirs are dumb idols; ours is Jehovah, a living God, that is what he is, and not as theirs, what men please to make him. He is in his holy temple in heaven, the residence of his glory, where we have access to him in the way, not which we have invented, but which he himself hath instituted: compare Ps. cxv. 3, "But our God is in the heavens," and Ps. xi. 4. 2nd. The multitude of their gods which they set up, and take so much pains to support, cannot thrust out our God; he is and will be in his holy temple still, and glorious in holiness. They have laid waste his temple at Jerusalem, but he has a temple above, that is out of the reach of their rage and malice, but within the reach of his people's faith and prayers. 3rd. Our God will "make all the world silent before him," will strike the idolaters as dumb as their idols, convicting them of their folly, and covering them with shame. He will silence the fury of the oppressors, and check their rage against his people. 4th. It is the duty of his people to attend him with silent adorings, Ps. lxv. 1, and patiently wait for his appearing to save them in his own way and time. Be still, and know that he is God, Zec. ii. 13.

CHAPTER III.

Still the correspondence is kept up between God and his prophet. In the first chapter he spoke to God, then God to him, and then he to God again; in the second chapter God spoke wholly to him by the spirit of prophecy; now, in this chapter, he speaks wholly to God by the spirit of prayer, for he would not let the intercourse drop on his side, like a genuine son of Abraham, who returned not to his place until God had left communing with him, Gen. xviii. 33. The prophet's prayer in this chapter is in imitation of David's Psalms, for it is directed to the chief musician, and is set to musical instruments. The prayer is left upon record for the use of the church, and particularly of the Jews in their captivity, while they were waiting for their deliverance, promised by the vision in the foregoing chapter. I. He earnestly begs God to relieve and succour his people in affliction, to hasten their deliverance, and to succour them in the meantime, ver. 2. II. He calls to mind the experiences which the church formerly had of God's glorious and gracious appearances on her behalf, when he brought Israel out of Egypt, through the wilderness, to Canaan, and there many a time wrought wonderful salvations for them, ver. 3—15. III. He affects himself with a holy concern for the present troubles of the church, but encourageth himself and others to hope that the issue will be comfortable and glorious at last, though all visible means fail, ver. 16—19.

A PRAYER of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth.

2 O LORD, I have heard thy speech, and was afraid:
O LORD, revive thy work in the midst of the years,
In the midst of the years make known;
In wrath remember mercy.

This chapter is entitled "A prayer of Habakkuk." It is a meditation with himself, an intercession for the church. Prophets were praying men, this prophet was so; "He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee," Gen. xx. 7; and sometimes they prayed for those even whom they prophesied against. They that were intimately acquainted with the mind of God concerning future events knew better than others how to order their prayers, and what to pray for, and in the foresight of troublous times could lay up a stock of prayers that might then receive a gracious answer, and so be serving the church by their prayers when their prophesying was over. This prophet had found God ready to answer his requests and complaints before, and therefore now repeats his applications to him. Because "God hath inclined his ear to us," we must resolve that therefore we will call upon him as long as we live.

First. The prophet owns the receipt of God's answer to his former representation, and the impression it made upon him; ver. 2, "O Lord, I have heard thy speech." 'Thy hearing,' so some read it, that which thou wouldst have us hear, the decree that is gone forth for the afflicting thy people. I received thine, and it is before me. Note, Those that would rightly order their speech to God must carefully observe, and lay before them, his speech to them. He had said, ch. ii. 1, "I will watch to see what he will say;" and now he owns, "Lord, I have heard thy speech;" for if we turn a deaf ear to God's word we can expect no other but that he should turn a deaf ear to our prayers, Pr. xxviii. 9. I heard it, and was afraid. Messages immediately from heaven commonly struck even the best and boldest men into a consternation: Moses, Isaiah, and Daniel did exceedingly fear and quake. But, besides that, the matter of this message made the prophet afraid; when he heard how low the people of God should be brought under the oppressing power of the Chaldeans, and how long they should continue under it, he was afraid lest their spirits should quite fail, and lest the church should be utterly rooted out and run down, and, being kept low so long, should be lost at length.

Secondly. He earnestly prays that, for the elect's sake, these days of trouble might be shortened, or the trouble of these days mitigated and moderated, or the people of God supported and comforted under it. He thinks it very long to wait till the end of the years; perhaps he refers to the seventy years fixed for the continuance of the captivity, and therefore, Lord, (saith he,) do something on our behalf "in the midst of the years," those years of distress; though we be not delivered, and our oppressors destroyed, yet let us not be abandoned and cast off.

1. Do something for thine own cause. "Revive thy work," that is, thy church; that is the work of God's own hand, formed by him, formed for him, revive that, even when it "walks in the midst of trouble," Ps. cxxxviii. 7, 8. Grant thy people "a little reviving in their bondage," Ezr. ix. 8; Ps. lxxxv. 6. 'Preserve alive thy work,' so some read it; though thy church be chastened, let it not be killed; though it have not its liberty, yet continue its life; save a remnant alive to be a seed of another generation. Revive the work of thy grace in us, by sanctifying the trouble to us, and supporting us under it, though the time be not yet come, even the set time for our deliverance out of it. Whatever becomes of us, though we be as dead and dry bones, Lord, "let thy work be revived;" let not that sink and go back, and come to nothing.

2. Do something for thine own honour. "In the midst of the years make known," make thyself known, for now "verily thou art a God that hidest thyself," Isa. xlv. 15. Make known thy power, thy pity, thy promise, thy providence, in the government of the world, for the safety and welfare of thy church. Though we be buried in obscurity, yet, Lord, make thyself known; whatever becomes of Israel, yet let not the God of Israel be forgotten in the world, but discover himself even in the midst of the dark years, before thou art expected to appear. When in the midst of the years of the captivity God miraculously owned the three children in the fiery furnace, and humbled Nebuchadnezzar, this prayer was answered, "In the midst of the years make known."

3. Do something for thy people's comfort. "In wrath remember mercy," and make that known. "Shew us thy mercy, O Lord," Ps. lxxxv. 7. They see God's displeasure against them in their troubles, and that makes them grievous indeed; there is wrath in the bitter cup,—that therefore they deprecate, and are earnest in begging that in the midst of wrath God would remember mercy to them, would make it appear that he is a merciful God, and they are vessels of his mercy. Note, Even those that are under the tokens of God's wrath yet must not despair of his mercy; and mercy, mere mercy, is that which we must flee to for refuge, and rely upon as our only plea. He doth not say, Remember our merit, but, Lord, remember thine own mercy.

3 God came from Teman,
And the Holy One from mount Paran. Selah.

MOUNT HOREB.

His glory covered the heavens,
And the earth was full of his praise.
4 And his brightness was as the light;
He had horns coming out of his hand:
And there was the hiding of his power.
5 Before him went the pestilence,
And burning coals went forth at his feet.
6 He stood, and measured the earth:
He beheld, and drove asunder the nations;
And the everlasting mountains were scattered,
The perpetual hills did bow:
His ways are everlasting.
7 I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction:
And the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble.
8 Was the LORD displeased against the rivers?
Was thine anger against the rivers?
Was thy wrath against the sea,
That thou didst ride upon thine horses
And thy chariots of salvation?
9 Thy bow was made quite naked,
According to the oaths of the tribes, even thy word. Selah.
Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers.
10 The mountains saw thee, and they trembled:
The overflowing of the water passed by:
The deep uttered his voice,
And lifted up his hands on high.
11 The sun and moon stood still in their habitation:
At the light of thine arrows they went,
And at the shining of thy glittering spear.
12 Thou didst march through the land in indignation,
Thou didst thresh the heathen in anger.
13 Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people,
Even for salvation with thine anointed;
Thou woundedst the head out of the house of the wicked,
By discovering the foundation unto the neck. Selah.
14 Thou didst strike through with his staves the head of his villages:
They came out as a whirlwind to scatter me:
Their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly.
15 Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses,
Through the heap of great waters.

It has been the usual practice of God's people, when they have been in distress, and ready to fall into despair, to help themselves by recollecting their experiences, and reviving them; "Considering the days of old, and the years of ancient times," Ps. lxxvii. 5, and pleading them with God in prayer, as he is pleased sometimes to plead them with himself; Isa. lxiii. 11, "Then he remembered the days of old." This is that which the prophet doth here, and he looks as far back as the first forming them into a people, when they were brought by miracles out of Egypt, a house of bondage, through the wilderness, a land of drought, into Canaan, then possessed by mighty nations. He that thus brought them at first into Canaan, through so much difficulty, can now bring them thither again out of Babylon, how great soever the difficulties are that lie in the way. Those great works of wonder wrought of old are here most magnificently described, for the greater encouragement to the faith of God's people in their present straits.

First. God appeared in his glory, so as he never did before or since; ver. 3, 4, "He came from Teman, even the Holy One from mount Paran." This refers to the visible display of the glory of God, when he gave the law upon mount Sinai, as appears by Deu. xxxiii. 2, whence these expressions are borrowed. Then "the Lord came down upon mount Sinai" in a cloud, Ex. xix. 20, and his glory was "as the devouring fire;" not only to enforce the law he then gave them, but to avow the deliverance he had wrought for them, and to magnify it; for the first word he said there was, "I am the Lord thy God, that brought thee out of the land of Egypt;" I that appear in this glory am the author of that work. Then "his glory covered the heavens," which shone with the reflection of that glorious appearance of his; the earth also was full of his praise, or, of his splendour, as some read it. People at a distance saw the cloud and fire on the top of mount Sinai, and praised the God of Israel; for the earth was full of those works of God which were to be praised. His "brightness was as the light," as the light of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. "He had horns," or bright beams, (so it should be rendered,) "coming out of his" side or "hand." Rays of glory were darted forth around him; and with some rays borrowed thence it was that Moses' face shone when he came down from that mount of glory. Some, by the horns, the 'two horns,' (for the word is dual,) "coming out of his hand," understand the two tables of the law, which perhaps, when God delivered them to Moses, though they were tables of stone, had a glory round them. These books were gilt with beams; and so it agrees with Deu. xxxiii. 2, "From his right hand went a fiery law for them." It is added, "And there was the hiding of his power;" that is, there was his hidden power, in the rays that came out of his hand. The operations of his power, compared with what he could have done, were rather the hiding of it than the discovery of it; the secrets of his power, as well as of his wisdom, are double to that which is seen, Job xi. 6.

Secondly. God sent plagues on Egypt, for the humbling of proud Pharaoh, and the obliging of him to let the people go; ver. 5, "Before him went the pestilence," which slew all the firstborn of Egypt in one night, and "burning coals went forth at his feet," when in the plague of hail there was "fire mingled with hail"—'burning diseases,' so the margin reads it; some think those that wasted Egypt, others, those with which the number of the Canaanites was diminished before Israel was brought in upon them. These were "at his feet," that is, at his coming, for they are at his command; he saith to them, Go, and they go; Come, and they come; Do this, and they do it.

Thirdly. He divided the land of Canaan to his people Israel, and expelled the heathen from before them; ver. 6, "He stood and measured the earth," measured that land, to assign it for an inheritance to Israel his people; Deu. xxxii. 8, 9, "He beheld, and drove asunder the nations" that were in possession of it. Though they combined together against Israel, God dispersed and discomfited them before Israel. Or, he exerted such a mighty power as was enough to shake in pieces all the nations of the earth. Then "the everlasting mountains were scattered, and the perpetual hills did bow;" the mighty princes and potentates of Canaan, that seemed as high, as strong, and as firmly fixed, as the mountains and hills, were broken to pieces, they and their kingdoms were totally subdued. Or, the power of God was so exerted as to have shaken the mountains and hills, nay, and Sinai did tremble, and the adjacent hills: see Ps. lxviii. 7, 8. To this he adds, "His ways are everlasting;" that is, all the motions of his providence are according to his eternal counsels; and he is the same for ever, that which he was yesterday and to-day. His covenant is unchangeable, and "his mercy endureth for ever." When he "drove asunder the nations of Canaan," one might have seen the "tents of Cushan in affliction, and the curtains of the land of Midian tremble," all the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries taking the alarm; and though they were not in the commission given to Israel to destroy, nor their land within the warrant given to Israel to possess, yet they thought their own house in danger when their neighbour's house was on fire, and therefore they were in a great fright, ver. 7. Balak the king of Moab was so, Num. xxii. 3, 4. Some make the tents of Cushan to be in affliction when, in the days of judge Othniel, God delivered Cushan-rishathaim into his hand, Jud. iii. 8; "and the curtains of the land of Midian to tremble," when in the days of judge Gideon a barley cake in a dream overthrew the tent of Midian. Jud. vii. 13.

Fourthly. He divided the Red Sea and Jordan, when they stood in the way of Israel's progress, and yet fetched a river out of a rock when Israel wanted it, ver. 8. One would have thought God was displeased with the rivers, and that his wrath was against the sea, for he made them give way and flee before him, when he "rode upon his horses and chariots of salvation," as a general at the head of his forces, mighty to save. Note, God's chariots are not so much chariots of state to himself as chariots of salvation to his people; it is his glory to be Israel's Saviour. This seems to be referred to again, ver. 15, "Thou didst walk through the sea," through the Red Sea, "with thine horses," in the pillar of cloud and fire, that was his chariot, borne by angels; thus thou didst walk secure, and so as to accommodate thyself to the slow pace that Israel could go, as Jacob tenderly drove, in consideration of his children and cattle. "Thou didst walk through the heap" or mud "of great waters;" and Israel likewise was led "through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness," Isa. lxiii. 13, 14. When they came to enter Canaan, the "overflowing of the water passed by;" that is, Jordan, which at that time overflowed all its banks, was divided, Jos. iii. 15. Note, When the difficulties in the way of perfecting the salvation of Israel seem most insuperable, when they rise to the height, and overflow, yet then God can put them by, break through them, and get over them. Then "the deep uttered his voice," when, the Red Sea and Jordan being divided, the waters roared and made a noise, as if they were sensible of the restraint they were under from proceeding in their natural course, and complained of it. They "lift up their hands" or sides "on high;" for the waters "stood up on a heap," Jos. iii. 16, as if they would have made opposition to the orders given them; "they lifted up their voices, lifted up their waves," but in vain, "the Lord on high was mightier than they," Ps. xciii. 3, 4. With the dividing the sea and Jordan, notice is again taken of the trembling of the mountains, as if the stop given to the waters gave a shock to the adjacent hills; they are put together, Ps. cxiv. 3, 4, when "the sea saw it and fled," and "Jordan was driven back," "the mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs." The whole creation yielded, earth and waters trembled and truckled "at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the mighty God of Jacob." But, (as Mr. Cowley paraphraseth it,)

'Fly where thou wilt, thou sea, and Jordan's current cease;
Jordan, there is no need of thee,
For at God's word, whene'er he please,
The rocks shall weep new waters forth instead of these.'

So here, "Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers;" that is, channels were made in the wilderness, such as seemed to cleave the earth, for the waters to run in that issued out of the rock, to supply the camp of Israel, and which followed them in all their removes. Note, The God of nature can alter and control the powers of nature which way he pleaseth, can turn waters into crystal rocks, and rocks into crystal streams.

Fifthly. He arrested the motion of the sun and moon to befriend and complete Israel's victories; ver. 11, "The sun and moon stood still" at the prayer of Joshua, that the Canaanites might not have the benefit of the night to favour their escape; they "stood still in their habitation" in the heavens, Ps. xix. 4; but with an eye to Gibeon, and the valley of Ajalon, where God's work was in the doing, and which they, though at so vast a distance, attended the motions of, "At the light," that is, at the direction, of "thine arrows they went," and at the "shining of thy glittering spear" they followed Israel's arms to favour them, according to the intimation of the arrows God shot, (as Jonathan's arrows, 1 Sam. xx. 20,) and which way soever his spear pointed (the glittering light of which they acknowledged to outshine theirs) that way they directed their influences, benign to Israel and malignant against their enemies, as when "the stars in their course fought against Sisera." Note, The heavenly bodies, as well as earth and seas, are at God's command, and, when he pleaseth, at Israel's service too.

Sixthly. He carried on and completed Israel's victories over the nations of Canaan and their kings, slew great kings and famous, Ps. cxxxvi. 17, 18. This is largely insisted upon here, as a proper plea with God to enforce the present petition, that he would restore them again to that land which they were, at the expense of so many lives, so many miracles, first put in possession of. Many expressions are here used to set forth the conquest of Canaan. 1. God's "bow was made quite naked," taken out of the case, to be employed for Israel. We would say, his sword was quite unsheathed, not drawn out a little way to frighten the enemy, and then put up again, but quite drawn out, not to be returned till they are all cut off. 2. He "marched through the land," from end to end, "in indignation," as scorning to let that wicked generation of Canaanites any longer possess so good a land. He marched cum fastidio,—'with disdain,' (so some,) despising their confederacies. 3. He "threshed the heathen in anger," trod them down, nay, he trod them out, as corn in the floor, to give them, and what they had, to be meat to his people Israel, Mic. iv. 13. 4. He "wounded the heads of the house of the wicked;" that is, he destroyed the families of the Canaanites, and wounded their princes, the heads of their families; nay, he cut off the heads, and so "discovered the foundations of them," even to the neck. Are they a building? They are rased "even to the foundation." Are they a body? They are plunged in deep mire, "even to the neck," so that they cannot get out or help themselves. He "brake the heads of leviathan in pieces," Ps. lxxiv. 14. Some apply this to Christ's victories over Satan and the powers of darkness, in which he "wounded the heads over many countries," Ps. cx. 6. 5. He "struck through with his staves the head of the villages," ver. 14. With Israel's staves God struck through the head of the villages of the enemies, whether Egypt or Canaan. Staves shall do the same execution as swords, when God pleaseth to make use of them. The enemy came out with the utmost force and fury, as a whirlwind to scatter me, (saith Israel;) for many a time have they thus afflicted me, thus attacked me, from my youth, Ps. cxxix. 1. Pharaoh, when he pursued Israel to the Red Sea, "came out as a whirlwind;" so did the kings of Canaan in their confederacies against Israel. "Their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly;" that is, they were as confident of success in their enterprise as ever any great man was of devouring a poor man that was no way a match for him, and his design against him was carried on with secresy; but God disappointed them, and their pride did but make their fall the more shameful, and God's care of his poor the more illustrious. 6. He walked to the sea with his horses, so some read ver. 15; that is, he carried Israel's victories to the Great Sea, which was opposite to that side of Canaan at which they entered; so that they went quite through it, and made themselves masters of it all; or, rather, God made them so, for they got it not by their own sword, Ps. xliv. 3.

Now there were three things that God had an eye to, in giving Israel so many bloody victories over the Canaanites: 1st. He would hereby make good his promise to the fathers; it was according to the oaths of the tribes, even his word, ver. 9. He had sworn to give this land to the tribes of Israel; it was his oath to Isaac, confirmed to Jacob, and repeated many a time to the tribes of Israel; "Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan." This word God will accomplish, though Israel be never so unworthy, Deu. ix. 5; and their enemies never so many and mighty. Note, What God doth for his tribes is according to the oaths of the tribes, according to what he hath said and sworn to them; for he is faithful that promised. 2nd. He would hereby shew his kindness to his people, because of their relation to him, and his interest in them; "Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people," ver. 13. All the powers of nature are shaken, and the course of nature changed, and every thing seems to be thrown into disorder, and all is for the salvation of God's people. There is a people in the world that are God's people, and their salvation is that which he has in his eye in all the operations of his providence. Heaven and earth shall sooner come together than any of the links in the golden chain of their salvation shall be broken; and even that which seems most unlikely shall by an overruling hand be made to work for their salvation, Phil. i. 19. 3rd. He would hereby give a type and figure of the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ. It is "for salvation with thine anointed," with Joshua, who led the armies of Israel; and was a figure of him whose name he bare, even Jesus, our Joshua. What God did for his Israel of old was done with an eye to his Anointed; for the sake of the Mediator, who was both the founder and foundation of the covenant made with them. It was salvation with him; for in all the salvations wrought for them, God "looked upon the face of the Anointed," and did them by him.

16 When I heard, my belly trembled;
My lips quivered at the voice: [myself,
Rottenness entered into my bones, and I trembled in
That I might rest in the day of trouble:
When he cometh up unto the people, he will invade them with his troops.
17 Although the fig tree shall not blossom,
Neither shall fruit be in the vines;
The labour of the olive shall fail,
And the fields shall yield no meat;
The flock shall be cut off from the fold,
And there shall be no herd in the stalls:
18 Yet I will rejoice in the LORD,
I will joy in the God of my salvation.
19 The LORD God is my strength,
And he will make my feet like hinds' feet,
And he will make me to walk upon mine high places.
To the chief singer on my stringed instruments.

Within the compass of these few lines we have the prophet in the highest degree both of trembling and triumphing; such are the varieties both of the state and of the spirit of God's people in this world. In heaven there shall be no more trembling, but everlasting triumphs.

First. The prophet had foreseen the prevalency of the church's enemies, and the long continuance of the church's troubles, and the sight made him tremble, ver. 16. This goes on with what he had said, ver. 2, "I have heard thy speech, and was afraid." "When I heard" what sad times were coming upon the church "my belly trembled, my lips quivered at the voice;" the news made such an impression that it put me into a perfect ague fit. The blood retiring to the heart, to succour that when it was ready to faint, the extreme parts were left destitute of spirits, so that his lips quivered. Nay, he was so weak, and unable to help himself, that he was as if rottenness had entered into his bones; he had no strength left in him, could neither stand nor go; he trembled in himself, trembled all over him, trembled within him. He yielded to this trembling, and troubled himself, as our Saviour did; his flesh trembled for fear of God, and he was afraid of his judgments, Ps. cxix. 120. He was touched with a tender concern for the calamities of the church, and trembled for fear lest they should end at length in its ruin, and that the name of Israel would be blotted out. Nor did he think it any disparagement to him, or a reproach to his courage, but freely owned he was one of those that trembled at God's word; for to them he will look with favour. "I tremble in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble." Note, When we see a day of trouble approaching, it concerns us to provide accordingly; and to lay up something in store, by the help of which we may rest in that day. And the best way to make sure of rest for ourselves in the day of trouble is, to tremble within ourselves at the word of God, and the threatenings of that word. He that has joy in store for them that sow in tears, has rest in store for them that tremble before him. Good hope through grace is founded in a holy fear. Noah, that was moved with fear, and trembled within himself at the warning given him of the deluge coming, had the ark for his resting-place in the day of that trouble. The prophet tells us what he said in his trembling; his fear was, "when he cometh up to the people," when the Chaldean comes up to the people of Israel, "he will invade them," will surround them, will break in upon them, nay, as it is in the margin, he will 'cut them in pieces,' "with his troops." He cried out, We are all undone, the whole nation of the Jews is lost and gone. Note, When things look bad, we are too apt to aggravate them, and make the worst of them.

Secondly. He had looked back upon the experiences of the church in former ages, and had observed what great things God had done for them, and so he recovered himself out of his fright; and not only retrieved his temper, but fell into a transport of holy joy, with an express non obstante,—'notwithstanding,' to the calamities he foresaw coming; and this not for himself only, but in the name of every faithful Israelite.

1. He supposeth the ruin of all his creature comforts and enjoyments, not only of the delights of this life, but even of the necessary supports of it, ver. 17. Famine is one of the ordinary effects of war, and those commonly feel it first and most that sit still and are quiet; the prophet and his pious friends (when the Chaldean army comes) will be plundered and stripped of all they have. Or he supposeth himself deprived of all, by blasting and unseasonable weather, or some other immediate hand of God; or the captives in Babylon have not the plenty of all good things they had in their own land. 1st. He supposeth the fruit trees to be withered, and become barren; the fig-tree, (which used to furnish them with much of their food, hence we often read of cakes of figs,) shall not so much as blossom, "neither shall fruit be in the vine," from which they had their drink that made glad the heart. He supposeth "the labour of the olive should fail," their oil, which was to them as butter is to us; the labour of the olive shall lie, so it is in the margin, their expectations from it shall be disappointed. 2nd. He supposeth the bread-corn to fail; "The fields shall yield no meat;" and, since the king himself is served of the field, if the product of that be withdrawn, every one will feel the want of them. 3rd. He supposeth the cattle to perish, either for want of the food which the field should yield, and doth not, or by disease, or being destroyed and carried away by the enemy. The flock is cut off from his fold, and there is no herd in the stall. Note, When we are in the full enjoyment of our creature comforts, we should consider that there may come a time when we shall be stripped of them all, and use them accordingly, as not abusing them, 1 Cor. vii. 29, 30.

2. He resolves to delight and triumph in God notwithstanding. When all is gone, his God is not gone; ver. 18, "Yet will I rejoice in the Lord." I shall have him to rejoice in, and will rejoice in him. Destroy the vines and the fig-trees, and you make all the mirth of a carnal heart to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. But those who, when they were full, enjoyed God in all, when they are emptied and impoverished can enjoy all in God, and can sit down upon a melancholy heap of the ruins of all their creature comforts, and even then can sing to the praise and glory of God, as the God of their salvation. This is the principal ground of our joy in God, that he is the God of our salvation, our eternal salvation, the salvation of the soul; and if he be so we may rejoice in him as such, in our greatest distresses, since by them our salvation cannot be hindered, but may be furthered. Note, Joy in God is never out of season; nay, it is in a special manner seasonable when we meet with losses and crosses in the world, that it may then appear our hearts are not set upon these things, nor our happiness bound up in them. See how the prophet triumphs in God, "The Lord is my strength," ver. 19. He that is the God of our salvation in another world will be our strength in this world to carry us on in our journey thither, and help us over the difficulties and oppositions we meet with in our way. Even then, when provisions are cut off, to make it appear that man lives not by bread alone, we may have the want of bread supplied by the graces and comforts of God's Spirit, and with the supplies of them. 1st. We shall be strong for our spiritual warfare and work; "The Lord is my strength," the strength of my heart. 2nd. We shall be swift for our spiritual race; "He will make my feet like hinds' feet," that with enlargements of heart I may run the way of his commands, and outrun my troubles. 3rd. We shall be successful in our spiritual enterprises; "He will make me to walk upon my high places," that is, I shall gain my point, shall be restored unto my own land, and tread upon the high places of the enemy, Deu. xxxii. 13; xxxiii. 29. Thus the prophet, that began his prayer with fear and trembling, concludes it with joy and triumph, for prayer is heart's ease to a gracious soul. When Hannah had prayed she "went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad." This prophet, finding it so, publishes his experience of it, and puts it into the hand of the chief singer for the use of the church, especially in the day of her captivity. And though then the harps were hung upon the willow-trees, yet, in hopes they would be resumed, and their right hand retrieve its cunning, which it had forgotten, he set his song upon Shigionoth, ver. 1, wandering tunes, according to the variable songs; and upon Neginoth, ver. 19, the stringed instruments. He that is afflicted, and has prayed aright, may then be so easy, may then be so merry, as to sing psalms.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF HABAKKUK.

CHAP. II.—2. That he may run that readeth it. That he who attentively peruses it may speed to save his life from the irruption of the Chaldeans, by which so many shall be cut off. The prophet does not mean that the words are to be made so plain that a man running by may easily read them, and catch their meaning. This interpretation has been frequently given; and it has been incautiously applied to the whole of the Bible: 'God's book is so plain, that he that runs may read;' but it is very foolish. God never intends that his words shall be understood by the careless. He that reads, studies, meditates, and prays, shall understand every portion of this sacred book that relates immediately to his own salvation. But no trifler can understand it. If the contents of a play bill were to be read as many read the Bible, they would know just as much of the one as they do of the other. 5. And cannot be satisfied. When he has obtained all that is within his reach he wishes for more, and becomes miserable because any limits are opposed to his insatiable ambition. It is said by Juvenal,

> 'One world sufficed not Alexander's mind;
> Cooped up, he seemed on earth and seas confined.'

And the poet justly ridicules him, because at last the sarcophagus was found too large for his body.—A. Clarke. 11. The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam—shall answer it. M. Henry says, 'The beam out of the timber in the roof;' but does not "the beam out of the timber," answering to "the stone out of the wall," imply that beams of timber were used by the Hebrews to unite and strengthen the mass of masonry? Walpole, in his Memoirs of Turkey, is of this opinion, and his statement renders it probable: 'The ancient architects of Egypt, Syria, and Italy used wood to unite and bind the stones together. The French, during their expedition to Egypt, observed, at Ombos and Philæ, that pieces of the sycamore had been formed for that purpose into a dove-tail shape; at Ombos they appear to have been covered with bitumen. Fastenings made of wood, of similar forms, were used in the ancient buildings of Italy, and were seen and described by F. Vacca. The Greeks, as we learn from Jerome, expressed this mode of binding stones together by the word ἰμαντωσις. In the prophet Habbakuk, ii. 11, the Hebrew term bearing a similar meaning is caphis. In the first Bible printed in English, by Coverdale, the passage is rendered, "like as the bond of wood bound together in the foundation of the house."'—Pictorial Bible. 19. Arise, it shall teach.

> 'Woe to him that saith to the wood, Awake!
> Wake up! to the dumb stone.
> It teach! There it is,
> Overlaid with gold and silver,
> But there is no breath at all within it.
> But Jehovah is in his holy temple;
> Keep silence before him all the earth.'

CHAP. III.—3. God came from Teman—from mount Paran. 'Is there any connexion between Feiran and the wilderness and mountain of Paran of the sacred Scripture? This is a question which we anxiously put to one another when in this valley. Travellers have not been agreed about the answer to be given. Niebuhr is disposed to reply to it in the affirmative, and Burckhardt in the negative. As far as the Hebrew and Arabic denominations of Feiran and Paran go, they may be identical. Paran is mentioned in Scripture in several historical and poetical passages, (Gen. xxi. 21; Num. x. 12; xii. 16; xiii. 3, 26; Deu. i. 1; xxxiii. 2; 1 Sam. xxv. 1, 2; 1 Kin. xi. 18; Hab. iii. 3; with these passages take, perhaps, Gen. xiv. 6, "And the Horites in their mount Seir, unto El-Paran, which is by the wilderness," in which it seems to be used in a comprehensive sense, as applicable, not merely to some particular part or parts of the desert, contiguous to mount Sinai and south of Judah, but to a large portion, if not the whole, of Arabia Petræa; and it may include this district, from which it may probably have derived its name. If this conclusion be correct, and I see no objection to it, it suggests a very sublime interpretation of the most sublime poetry of Habakkuk:

> "God came from Teman,
> And the Holy One from mount Paran,
> His glory covered the heavens,
> And the earth was full of his praise,
> And his brightness was as the light:
> He had horns (rays) coming out of his hand:
> And there was the hiding of his power."

When God descended to give the law to his people, the Divine glory was revealed from Teman, or Maan, in the east of Edom, to Paran, at Serbal, in the west. It literally covered the heavens over this extent. His majestic presence shook a large portion of the globe.'—Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible. Selah. See Supplementary Note on Ps. iii. 6. He stood and measured the earth. He stood and made the earth to tremble, exhibiting 'one of the boldest, most abrupt, and sublime turns to be found in sacred poetry. While Jehovah is marching forth for the deliverance of his people, he stops all of a sudden in his progress, the immediate effects of which are universal consternation and terror. Nature, in her strongest and most ancient formations, is broken in pieces before him. The inhabitants of the earth tremble at his look.'—H. The everlasting mountains were scattered. Or, broken asunder. This may refer to the convulsions on mount Sinai, and to the earthquake which announced the descent of the Most High: see Ex. xix. 18.—God occupied the summit of the eternal mount Sinai, and led his people over the eternal mountains of Arabia Petræa; and this sense is preferable to the figurative one, that his ways or doings are predetermined from everlasting.—Newcome. The epithets 'eternal' and 'everlasting' are applied to mountains and immense rocks, because no other parts of nature are less subject to decay or change than these immense masses of earth and stone, and that almost indestructible stone, granite, out of which Sinai appears to be formed.—A. Clarke. 16. When I heard. Having finished the poetic rehearsal of the mighty acts of Jehovah on behalf of his people in ancient times, which he had composed in order to inspire the pious with unshaken confidence in him as their covenant God, Habakkuk reverts to the fear which had seized him on hearing of the judgments that were to be inflicted upon his country by the Chaldeans, ver. 2. Instead of there entering into a description of his feelings, he broke out in an earnest prayer that God would exercise pity towards Israel, from which there was an easy transition to the ancient Divine interpositions. He now describes those feelings in very forcible and affecting language. The voice is to be referred to the Divine threatening recorded ch. i. 6. The quivering of the prophet's lips is merely expressive of the effect of the fear with which he was seized, and has no reference to his delivery of the threatening.—H. 17, 18. Although the fig-tree. From a statement of the assurance which he possessed of the mental tranquillity which he should enjoy during the anticipated calamity, Habakkuk rises to a triumphant assertion of the holy joy and exultation which would be vouchsafed to him amidst all the desolation to which his country might be subjected. The desolation here so graphically and forcibly described is that which was to be effected by the Chaldeans, whose army would consume or destroy the best and most necessary productions of the land; not only seizing upon the cattle and devouring the fruits of the earth, but so injuring the trees as to render them incapable of yielding any produce. The passage contains the most beautiful exhibition of the power of true religion to be found in the Bible.—H. Faith in Christ prepares for every event. Though God seems to threaten our dearest comforts, yet when we remember it is his hand, when we consider it is his design, his love, his wisdom, and his power, we cannot refuse to trust him. Then to think how much less our sufferings are than our sins deserve, how many mercies we still enjoy; to compare the present momentary affliction with the exceeding weight of glory which shall be revealed; to recollect that the time is short, the hour swiftly approaching, when the Lord shall wipe away all tears, and constrain us with wonder and joy to sing, He hath done all things well. Such considerations, with the remembrance of what Christ has suffered for us, are always at hand to compose the believer's soul under troubles, and will be effectual according to the degree of faith. Our faith, also, is strengthened by affliction; we learn more of our own insufficiency, and the vanity of things about us, and discover more of the power, faithfulness, and nearness of a prayer-hearing God. Upon this ground Habakkuk could rejoice under the loss of all earthly comforts, and say, I will rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation. The name of Jesus, when we can speak of him as ours, is balm for every wound, a cordial for every care. It is as ointment poured forth, diffusing fragrance through the whole soul.—John Newton.

WORSHIPPING ON THE HOUSETOPS.

AN

PROPHECY OF ZEPHANIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THIS prophet is placed last, as he was last in time of all the minor prophets before the captivity, and not long before Jeremiah, who lived at the time of the captivity. He foretells the general destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and sets their sins in order before them, which had provoked God to bring their ruin upon them; calls them to repentance, threatens the neighbouring nations with the like destructions, and gives encouraging promises of their joyful return out of captivity in due time, which have a reference to the grace of the Gospel. We have in the first verse an account of the prophet, and the date of his prophecy, which supersedes our inquiry concerning them here.

A.D. 3374. B.C. 630.

CHAPTER I.

After the title of the book, ver. 1, here is, I. A threatening of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, an utter destruction by the Chaldeans, ver. 2—4. II. A charge against them for their gross sin, which provoked God to bring that destruction upon them, ver. 5, 6; and so he goes on in the rest of the chapter, setting both the judgments before them, that they might prevent them or prepare for them, and the sins that destroy them, that they might judge themselves, and justify God in what was brought upon them. 1. They must hold their peace, because they had greatly sinned, ver. 7—9; but, 2. They shall howl, because the trouble will be great. The day of the Lord is near, and it will be a terrible day, ver. 10—18. Such fair and timely warning as this did God give to the Jews of the approaching captivity, but they hardened their neck, which made their destruction remediless.

THE word of the LORD which came unto Zephaniah the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah, in the days of Josiah the son of Amon, king of Judah.

2 I will utterly consume all things from off the land, saith the LORD.

3 I will consume man and beast; I will consume the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea, And the stumblingblocks with the wicked; And I will cut off man from off the land, saith the LORD.

4 I will also stretch out mine hand upon Judah, And upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; And I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place, And the name of the Chemarims with the priests;

5 And them that worship the host of heaven upon the housetops; And them that worship and that swear by the LORD, And that swear by Malcham;

6 And them that are turned back from the LORD; And those that have not sought the LORD, nor enquired for him.

Here is, First. The title-page of this book, ver. 1; in which we may observe, 1. What authority it has, and who gave it that authority. It is from heaven, and not of men. It is "the word of the Lord." 2. Who was the instrument of conveying it to the church. His name was Zephaniah, which signifies 'the servant of the Lord;' for God revealed his secrets to his servants the prophets. The pedigrees of other prophets, whose extraction we have an account of, goes no farther back than their father, except Zecharias, whose grandfather is also named. But this of Zephaniah goes back four generations, and the highest mentioned is Hizkiah. It is the very same name in the original with that of Hezekiah, king of Judah, (2 Kin. xviii. 1,) and it is very probable is the same person; and if so, our prophet was lineally descended from that pious prince, and being of the royal family he could with the better grace reprove the folly of the king's children, as he doth, ver. 8. 3. When this prophet prophesied. "In the days of Josiah king of Judah," who reigned well; and in the twelfth year of his reign began vigorously and carried on a work of reformation, in which he destroyed idols and idolatry. Now it doth not appear whether Zephaniah prophesied in the beginning of his reign; if so, we may suppose his prophesying had a great and good influence on that reformation. When he as God's messenger reproved the idolatries of Jerusalem, Josiah as God's vicegerent removed them; and reformation is likely then to go on and prosper when both magistrates and ministers do their part towards it. If it were towards the latter end of his reign that he prophesied, we sadly see how a corrupt people relapse into their former distempers. The idolatries Josiah had abolished it should seem returned in his own time, when the heat of the reformation began a little to abate and wear off. What good can the best reformers do with a people that hate to be reformed, as if they longed to be ruined?

Secondly. The summary or contents of this book. The general proposition contained in it is, that utter destruction is coming apace upon Judah and Jerusalem for sin. Without preamble or apology he begins abruptly; ver. 2, "By taking away I will make an end of all things from off the face of the land, saith the Lord." Ruin is coming, utter ruin, destruction from the Almighty; he hath said it, who can and will make good what he hath said, "I will utterly consume all things." I will gather all things, (so some,) I will recall all the blessings I have bestowed, because they have abused them, and so forfeited them. The consumption determined shall take away,

1. The inferior creatures; "I will consume the beasts, the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea," ver. 3; as in the deluge, "every living substance was destroyed that was upon the face of the ground," Gen. vii. 23. The creatures were made for man's use, and therefore, when he has perverted the use of them, and made them subject to vanity, God, to shew the greatness of his displeasure against the sin of man, involves them in his punishment. The expressions are figurative, speaking a universal desolation. Those that fly never so high, as the fowls of heaven, and think themselves out of the reach of the enemy's hand,—those that hide never so close, as the fishes of the sea, and think themselves out of the reach of the enemy's eye,—yet shall become a prey to them, and be utterly consumed.

2. The children of men; "I will consume man, I will cut off man from the land." The land shall be dispeopled and left uninhabited; not only, I will destroy Israel, but destroy man. The land shall enjoy her sabbaths. I will cut off not only the wicked men, but all men; even the few among them that are good shall be involved in this common calamity. Though they shall not be cut off from the Lord, yet they shall be "cut off from the land." It is with Judah and Jerusalem that God has his quarrel, both city and country, and upon them he will stretch out his hand—the hand of his power, the hand of his wrath; and who knows the power of his anger? ver. 4. They that will not humble themselves under God's mighty hand shall be humbled and brought down by it. Note, Even Judah, where God is known, and Jerusalem, where his dwelling-place is, if they revolt from him, and rebel against him, shall have his hand stretched out against them.

3. All wicked people, and all those things that are the matter of their wickedness; ver. 3, "I will consume the stumblingblocks with the wicked," the idols with the idolaters, the offences with the offenders. Josiah had taken away the stumblingblocks, and as far as he could had purged the land of the monuments of idolatry, hoping that there would be no more idolatry; but "the wicked will do wickedly," the dog will return to his vomit; and therefore, since the sin will not otherwise be cured, the sinners must themselves be consumed, even the wicked with the stumblingblocks of their iniquity, Eze. xiv. 3. Since it was not done by the sword of justice, it shall be done by the sword of war. See who the sinners are that shall be consumed.

1st. The professed idolaters, that avowed idolatry, and were wedded to it. The remnant of Baal shall be cut off, the images of Baal, and the worshippers of those images. Josiah cut off a great deal of Baal, but that which was so close as to escape the eye, or so bold as to escape the hand of his justice, God will cut off, even all the remains of it. The Chaldeans would spare none of the images of Baal, or the worshippers of those images. The Chemarims shall be cut off. We read of them in the history of Josiah's reformation; 2 Kin. xxiii. 5, "He put down the idolatrous priests;" the word is, the 'Chemarim.' The word signifies black men. Some think, because they wore black cloth, affecting to appear grave; others, because their faces were black with attending the altars, or the fires in which they burnt their children to Moloch. They seem to have been immediate attendants upon the service of Baal. They shall be cut off with the priests, the regulars with the seculars; the very name of them shall be cut off; the order shall be quite abolished, so as to be forgotten, or remembered with detestation. And, among other idolaters, the "worshippers of the host of heaven upon the housetops" shall be cut off, ver. 5, who justified themselves in their idolatry with those that did not worship images, the work of their own hands, but offered their sacrifices, and burnt their incense, to the sun, moon, and stars, immediately upon the tops of their houses. But God will let them know that he is a jealous God, and will not endure any rival; and though some have thought that the most specious and plausible idolatry, yet it will appear as great an offence to God to give Divine honour to a star, as to give them to a stone or stock. Even "the worshippers of the host of heaven shall be consumed," as well as the worshippers of the beasts of the earth, or the fiends of hell. The sin of the adulteress is not the less sinful for the gaiety of the adulterer.

2nd. Those also shall be consumed that think to compound the matter between God and idols, and keep an even hand between them, that halt between God and Baal, and worship between Jehovah and Moloch, and swear by both; or, as it might better be read, swear to the Lord and to Malcham. They bind themselves by oath and covenant to the service both of God and idols. They have a good opinion of the worship of the God of Israel,—it is the religion of their country, and has been long so, and therefore they will by no means quit it; but they think it will be very much improved and beautified if they join with it the worship of Moloch, for that also is much used in other countries, and travellers admire it; there is a great deal of good fancy and strong flame in it. They cannot keep always to the worship of a God whom they have no visible representation of, and therefore they must have an image; and what better than the image of Moloch, a king? They think they shall effectually atone for their sin if they swear to Moloch, and, pursuant to that oath, burn their children in sacrifice to that idol; and yet, if they do amiss in that, they hope to atone for it in worshipping the God of Israel too. Note, Those that think to divide their affections and adorations between God and idols will not only come short of acceptance with God, but will have their doom with the worst of idolaters; for what communion can there be between light and darkness,—Christ and Belial, God and Mammon? She whose own the child is not pleads for the dividing of it, for if Satan have half, he will have all; but the true mother saith, Divide it not, for if God have but half, he will have none. Such waters will not be long sweet if they come from a fountain that sends forth bitter water too. What have they to do to swear by the Lord that swear by Malcham?

3rd. Those also shall be consumed that have apostatized from God, together with those that never gave up their names to him; ver. 6, I will cut off, First. "Them that are turned back from the Lord;" that were well taught, and begun well, that had given up their names to him, and set out at first in the worship of him, but have flown off, and turned aside, and fallen in with idolaters, and deserted those good ways of God which they were brought up in, and despised them; those God will be sure to reckon with who are renegadoes from his service, that began in the Spirit and ended in the flesh; they shall be treated as deserters, to whom no mercy is shewed. Secondly. "Those that have not sought the Lord," nor ever inquired for him, never made any profession of religion, and think to excuse themselves with that, yet that shall not excuse them; nay, that is the thing laid to their charge: they are atheistical, careless people, that live without God in the world; and those that do so, are certainly unworthy to live upon God in the world.

7 Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord GOD:
For the day of the LORD is at hand:
For the LORD hath prepared a sacrifice, he hath bid his [guests.
8 And it shall come to pass in the day of the LORD's sacrifice,
That I will punish the princes, and the king's children,
And all such as are clothed with strange apparel.
9 In the same day also will I punish all those that leap on the threshold,
Which fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit.
10 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD,
That there shall be the noise of a cry from the fish gate,
And an howling from the second,
And a great crashing from the hills.
11 Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh,
For all the merchant people are cut down;
All they that bear silver are cut off.
12 And it shall come to pass at that time,
That I will search Jerusalem with candles,
And punish the men that are settled on their lees:
That say in their heart,
The LORD will not do good, neither will he do evil.
13 Therefore their goods shall become a booty,
And their houses a desolation:
They shall also build houses,
But not inhabit them;
And they shall plant vineyards,
But not drink the wine thereof.

Notice is here given to Judah and Jerusalem that God is coming forth against them, and will be with them shortly: his presence as a just avenger, his day, the day of his judgment and his wrath, are not far off, ver. 7. Those that improve not the presence of God with them as a Father, but sin away that presence, may expect his presence with them as a Judge, to call them to an account for the contempt put upon his grace. The day of the Lord will come. Men have their day now, when they take a liberty to do what they please, but God's day is at hand. It is here called a sacrifice, a sacrifice of his preparing; for the punishing presumptuous sinners is a sacrifice to the justice of God, some reparation to his injured honour. They that brought their offerings to other gods were themselves justly made victims to the true God. On a day of sacrifice great slaughter was made; so shall there be in Jerusalem; men shall be killed up as fast as lambs for the altar, with as little regret, with as much pleasure; "The slain of the Lord shall be many." On a day of sacrifice great feasts were made upon the sacrifices; so the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem shall be feasted upon by their enemies, the Chaldeans. These are the guests God has prepared and invited to come and glut themselves,—their revenge with slaughter, and their covetousness with plunder. Now observe,

First. Who they are that are marked to be sacrificed, that shall be visited and punished in this day of reckoning, and what it is they shall be called to an account for.

1. The royal family, because of the dignity of their place, shall be first reckoned with, for their pride and vanity and affectation; ver. 8, "I will punish the princes, and the king's children," who think themselves exempt from punishment; they shall find themselves accountable to God, and that, as high as they are, he is above them. They shall be punished, and all such as like them are clothed with strange apparel, that in contempt of their own country (where probably it was the custom to go in a very plain dress, as became the seed of Jacob, that plain man,) affected to appear in the fashion of other nations, and introduced their modes in apparel, studying to resemble those from whom God had appointed them, even in their clothes, industriously to distinguish themselves. The princes and king's children thought scorn to wear any home-made stuffs, though God had provided them fine linen and silks, Eze. xvi. 10; but they must send abroad to strange countries for their clothes, which would not please unless they were far-fetched, and dear-bought; and even those of inferior rank affected to imitate the princes and the king's children. Pride in apparel is displeasing to God, and a symptom of the degeneracy of a people.

2. The noblemen and their stewards and servants come next to be reckoned with; ver. 9, "In the same day will I punish those that leap on the threshold," a phrase, no doubt, well understood then, and probably signified the invading their neighbours' rights, entering their houses by force and violence, and seizing their possessions. They leap on the threshold, as much as to say, the house is their own, and they will keep their hold of it; and accordingly make all in it their own that they can lay their hands on, and so fill their masters' houses with goods gotten by violence and deceit, and with all the guilt thereby contracted. Nor shall it suffice them to say that the ill-got gains were not for themselves, but for their masters, and what they did was by their order; for the obligations we lie under to keep God's commandments are prior and superior to the obligations we lie under to serve the interests of any master on earth.

3. The trading people and the rich merchants are the next called to account. Iniquity is found in their end of the town among the inhabitants of Maktesh, a low part of Jerusalem, deep like a mortar, (for so the word signifies). The goldsmiths lived there, Neh. iii. 32, and the merchants; and they are now cut down, they are broken, and have shut up their shops, and become bankrupts; nay, all they that bear silver are cut off in the first place by the invaders, for the sake of the silver they carry, which is so far from being a protection to them that it will expose and betray them. The conquerors aimed at the wealthy men, and carried them off first, while the poor of the land escaped. Or, it may be meant of a general decay of trade, which was a preface and introduction to the general destruction of the land. It is the token of a declining state when great dealers are cut down, and great bankers are cut off and become bankrupts, who cannot fall alone, but with themselves ruin many.

4. All the secure and careless people, the sons of pleasure, that live a loose, idle life, are next reckoned with, ver. 12. They come from all parts of the country, to take up their quarters in the head-quarters of the kingdom, where they take private lodgings, and indulge themselves in ease and luxury; but God will find them out and punish them; "At that time I will search" Jerusalem "with candles," to discover them, that they may be brought out to condign punishment. This intimates that they conceal themselves, as being either ashamed of the sin or afraid of the punishment of it. When the judgments of God are abroad they hope to escape by absconding and getting out of the way; but God will search Jerusalem, as search is made for a malefactor in disguise, that is harboured by his accomplices. God's hand will find out all his enemies, wherever they lie hid, and will punish not only the secret idolaters, but the secret epicures and profane; and those are they that are described, and marks are given by which they will be discovered, when strict search is made for them. 1st. Their dispositions are sensual. They are settled on their lees, intoxicated with their pleasures, strengthening themselves in their wealth and wickedness; they are secure and easy, and because they have had no changes they fear none; as Moab, Jer. xlviii. 11, "They had not been emptied from vessel to vessel;" they "fill themselves with wine and strong drink," and banish all thought, saying, "To-morrow shall be as this day," Isa. lvi. 12. Their being "settled on their lees," signifies the same with being "inclosed in their own fat," Ps. xvii. 10. 2nd. Their notions are atheistical. They could not live such loose lives but that they say "in their heart, The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil;" that is, he will do nothing. They deny his providential government of the world; what good and evil there is in the world comes by the wheel of fortune, and not by the disposal of a wise and supreme Director. They deny his moral government, and his dispensing of rewards and punishments. "The Lord will not do good" to those that serve him, nor do evil to those that rebel against him; and therefore there is nothing got by religion, nor lost by sin. This is the effect of their sensuality; if they were not drowned in sense, they could not be thus senseless; nor be so stupid, if they had not stupified themselves with the love of pleasure. It was also the cause of their sensuality. Men would not make a god of their belly if they did not at first become so vain, so vile in their imaginations, as to think the God that made them altogether such an one as themselves. But God will punish them; "their end is destruction," Phil. iii. 19.

Secondly. What the destruction will be with which God will punish these sinners, and what course he will take with them. 1. He will silence them; ver. 7, "Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord;" that is, he will force them to hold their peace, will strike them dumb with horror and amazement. They shall be speechless, all the excuses of their sin and exceptions against the sentence will be overruled, and they shall not have a word to say for themselves. 2. He will sacrifice them, for it is "the day of the Lord's sacrifice," ver. 8. He will give them into the hands of their enemies, and glorify himself thereby. 3. He will fill both city and country with lamentation; ver. 10, "In that day there shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate," so called because near either to the fish-ponds or fish-market. It belonged to the city of David, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3; perhaps the same with that which is called the first gate, Zec. xiv. 10, and if so it will explain what follows here, "And a howling from the second," namely, the second gate, which was next to that fish-gate. The alarm shall go round the walls of Jerusalem, from gate to gate; and there shall be "a great crushing from the hills," a mighty noise from the mountains round about Jerusalem, either from the acclamations of the victorious invaders or the lamentations of the timorous invaded, or both. The inhabitants of the city, even of the closest safest part of the city, shall howl, ver. 11, so clamorous shall the grief be. 4. They shall be stripped of all they have, it shall be a prey to the enemy; ver. 13, Their household goods and shop goods shall become a booty, and a rich booty they shall be; their houses shall be levelled with the ground, and be a desolation. Those of them that have built new houses shall not inherit them, but the invaders shall get and keep possession of them; and the vineyards they have planted they shall not drink the wine of, but, instead of having it for the relief of their friends that faint among them, they shall part with it for the animating of their foes, that fight against them, Deu. xxviii. 30.

14 The great day of the LORD is near,
It is near, and hasteth greatly,
Even the voice of the day of the LORD:
The mighty man shall cry there bitterly.
15 That day is a day of wrath,
A day of trouble and distress,
A day of wasteness and desolation,
A day of darkness and gloominess,
A day of clouds and thick darkness,
16 A day of the trumpet and alarm
Against the fenced cities, and against the high towers.
17 And I will bring distress upon men,
That they shall walk like blind men,
Because they have sinned against the LORD:
And their blood shall be poured out as dust,
And their flesh as the dung. [them
18 Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver
In the day of the LORD's wrath; [jealousy:
But the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his
For he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them

Nothing could be expressed with more spirit and life, nor in words more proper to startle and awaken a secure and careless people, than the warning here given to Judah and Jerusalem of the approaching destruction by the Chaldeans. That is enough to make the sinners in Zion tremble, that it is the day of the Lord, the day in which he will manifest himself by taking vengeance on them. It is "the great day of the Lord," a specimen of the day of judgment, a kind of doomsday, as the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans is represented to be in our Saviour's prediction concerning it, Mat. xxiv. 27.

First. This day of the Lord is here spoken of as very near. The vision is not for a great while to come, as those imagine that put the evil day far from them; they deceive themselves that look upon it as a thing at a distance, for it is near, it is near, it hasteth greatly. The prophet gives the alarm like one that is in earnest, like one that awakens a family with the cry of Fire! fire! when it is at the next door that the danger is. It is near, it is near, and therefore it is high time to bestir yourselves, and do what you can for your own safety before it be too late. It is madness for those to slumber whose damnation slumbereth not, and to linger when it hastens.

Secondly. It is spoken of as a very dreadful day. The very voice of this day of the Lord, the noise of it when it is coming, shall be so terrible as to make "the mighty men cry there bitterly," cry for fear, as children do. "It shall be a vexation to hear the report" of it. In the last great day of the Lord the mighty men shall cry bitterly to rocks and mountains to shelter them, but in vain. Observe how emphatically the prophet speaks of this day approaching, ver. 15. It is a day of wrath, God's wrath, wrath in perfection, wrath to the utmost; it will be a day of trouble and distress to the sinners, they shall be in pain, and shall see no way of easing or helping themselves. The miseries of the damned are summed up (perhaps with reference to this here) in the indignation and wrath of God, which are the cause, and the tribulation and anguish of the sinner's soul, which are the effect, Rom. ii. 8, 9. It will be a day of trouble and distress to the inhabitants, and a day of wasteness and desolation to the whole land; that fruitful land shall be turned into a wilderness. It shall be a day of darkness and gloominess, every thing shall look dismal, and there shall not be the least gleam of comfort or glimpse of hope; look round, and it is all black. It is "a day of clouds and thick darkness;" there is not only nothing encouraging, but every thing threatening; the thick clouds are big with storms and tempests.

Thirdly. It is spoken of as a destroying day, ver. 16, 17. It shall be destroying, 1. To places, even the strongest and best fortified. "A day of the trumpet and alarm against the fenced cities," to break into them, and against the high towers, to bring them down. For what forts, what fences, can hold out against the wrath of God? 2. To persons; ver. 17, "I will bring distress upon men," the strongest and stoutest of men, their hearts and hands shall fail them; they shall "walk like blind men," wandering endlessly, "because they have sinned against the Lord." Note, Those that walk as ill men will justly be left to walk as blind men, always in the dark, in doubt and danger, without any guide or comfort, and falling at length into the ditch. Because they have sinned against the Lord he will deliver them into the hands of cruel enemies, that shall pour out their blood as dust, so profusely and with as little regret, and their flesh shall be thrown as dung upon the dunghill.

Fourthly. The destruction of that day will be unavoidable and universal, ver. 18. 1. There shall be no escaping it by ransom. Neither their silver nor their gold, which they have hoarded up so covetously against the evil day, or which they have spent so prodigally to make friends for such a time, "shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath." Another prophet borrowed these words from this, with reference to the same event, Eze. vii. 19. Note, Riches profit not in the day of wrath, Pr. xi. 4. Nay, riches expose to the wrath of men, Eccl. v. 13, and riches abused to the wrath of God. 2. There shall be no escaping it by flight or concealment; for the "whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy," and where then can a hiding-place be found? See what the fire of God's jealousy is, and what the force of it; it will devour whole lands: how then can particular persons stand before it? He shall make riddance, "a speedy riddance, of all them that dwell in the land;" as the husbandman, when he rids his ground, cuts up all the briars and thorns for the fire. Note, Sometimes the judgments of God make riddance, even utter riddance, with sinful nations, a speedy riddance; their destruction is effected, is completed, in a little time. Let not sinners be laid asleep by the patience of God; for, when the measure of their iniquity is full, his justice will both overtake and overcome—will make quick work and thorough work.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have, I. An earnest exhortation to the nation of the Jews to repent, and make their peace with God, and so to prevent the judgments threatened before it was too late, ver. 1—3; and this inferred from the revelation of God's wrath against them in the foregoing chapter. II. A denunciation of the judgments of God against divers of the neighbour nations that had assisted or rejoiced in the calamity of Israel. 1. The Philistines, ver. 4—7; 2. The Moabites and Ammonites, ver. 8—11; 3. The Ethiopians and Assyrians, ver. 12—15. All these shall drink of the same cup of trembling that is put into the hands of God's people, as was foretold by other prophets before and after.

GATHER yourselves together,
Yea, gather together, O nation not desired;
2 Before the decree bring forth,
Before the day pass as the chaff,
Before the fierce anger of the LORD come upon you,
Before the day of the LORD's anger come upon you.
3 Seek ye the LORD, all ye meek of the earth,
Which have wrought his judgment;
Seek righteousness, seek meekness:
It may be ye shall be hid in the day of the LORD's anger.

Here we see what the prophet meant in that terrible description of the approaching judgments we had in the foregoing chapter. From first to last his design was, not to drive the people to despair, but to drive them to God, and to their duty; not to frighten them out of their wits, but to frighten them out of their sins. And in pursuance of that he here calls them to repentance, national repentance, as the only way to prevent a national ruin. Observe,

First. The summons given them to a national assembly; ver. 1, "Gather yourselves together." He had told them, in the last words of the foregoing chapter, that God would make a "speedy riddance of all that dwell in the land," upon which, one would think, it should follow, Disperse yourselves, and flee for shelter where you can find a place. When the decree was absolutely gone forth for the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, that was the advice given, Mat. xxiv. 16, "Then let them which be in Judæa flee into the mountains;" but here it is otherwise: God warns that he may not wound, threatens that he may not strike, and therefore calls to the people to use means for the turning away of his wrath. The summons is given to a nation not desired. The word signifies either, 1. Not desiring; that has not any desires towards God or the remembrance of his name, is not desirous of his favour and grace, but very indifferent to it, has no mind to repent and reform; yet come together, and see if you can stir up desires in one another. Thus God is often found of them that sought him not, nor asked for him, Isa. lxv. 1. Or, 2. Not desirable; no ways lovely, nor having any thing in them amiable, or which might recommend them to God. The land of Israel had been "a pleasant land, a land of delight," Dan. xi. 41; but now it is unlovely, it is a nation not desired, to which God might justly say, "Depart from me;" but he saith, Gather together to me, and let us see if any expedient can be found out for the preventing thy ruin. Gather together, that you may in a body humble yourselves before God, may fast, and pray, and seek his face. Gather together to consult among yourselves what is to be done in this critical juncture, that every one may consider of it, may give and take advice, and speak his mind, and that what is done may be done by consent, and so may be a national act. Some read it, 'Inquire into yourselves, yea, inquire into yourselves;' examine your consciences, look into your hearts, search and try your ways; inquire into yourselves, that you may find out the sin by which God has been provoked to this displeasure against you, and may find out the way of returning to him. Note, When God is contending with us, it concerns us to inquire into ourselves.

Secondly. Arguments urged to press them to the utmost seriousness and expedition herein, ver. 2. Do it in earnest, do it with all speed, before it be too late, "before the decree bring forth, before the day pass." The manner of speaking here is very lively and awakening, designed to make them apprehensive, as all sinners are concerned to be, 1. That their danger is very great. Their all lies at stake; it is a matter of life and death, which therefore well requires and deserves the closest application of mind that can be. It is not a trifle, and therefore is not a thing to be trifled about. It is the "fierce anger of the Lord" that is kindled against them, and is just ready to kindle upon them; that devouring fire which none can dwell with, which none can make head against, or hold up their head under. It is the day of the Lord's anger, the day set for the pouring out of the full vials of it, that you are threatened with, that great day of the Lord spoken of, ch. i. 14. Are you not concerned to prepare for that day? 2. That it is very imminent. Bestir yourselves now quickly, "before the decree bring forth," and then it will be too late, the opportunity will be lost, and never retrieved. The decree is as it were big with child, and will bring forth the day, the terrible day, which shall pass as chaff; that is, which shall hurry you away into captivity as chaff before the wind. "We know not what a day may bring forth," Pr. xxvii. 1; but we do know what the decree will bring forth against impenitent sinners, whom therefore it highly concerns to repent in time, in the accepted time. Note, It is the wisdom of those whom God has a controversy with to agree with him quickly, while they are in the way, before his fierce anger comes upon them, not to be turned away. In a case of this nature delays are highly dangerous, and may be fatal; they will be so, if by them the heart is hardened. How solicitous should we all be to make our peace with God before the Spirit withdraws from us, or ceaseth to strive with us; before the day of grace be over, or the day of life; before our everlasting state shall be determined on the other side the great gulf fixed!

Thirdly. Directions prescribed for the doing of this effectually. It is not enough to gather together in a consternation, but they must seriously and calmly apply themselves to the duty of the day; ver. 3, "Seek ye the Lord." That they might find mercy with God they are here put upon seeking; for so is the rule, "Seek, and ye shall find." A general call was given to the whole nation to gather together, but little good is to be expected from the far greater part of them; if the land be saved, it must be by the interest and intercession of the pious few, and therefore to them the exhortation here is particularly directed. And observe, 1. How they are described. They are "the meek of the earth," or of the land. It is the distinguishing character of the people of God that they are the meek ones of the earth; this is their badge, it is their livery. They are modest, and humble, and low in their own eyes; they are mild, and gentle, and yielding to others, not soon angry, not very angry, not long angry; they are the quiet in the land, Ps. xxxv. 20. And they are subject and submissive to their God, to all his precepts and all his providences; actuated by this principle and disposition, they have wrought his judgments, that is, have obeyed his laws, observed his institutions, have made conscience of their duty to him, and have laid out themselves for the advancement of his honour and interest in the world. 2. What they are required to do. They must seek; which notes both a careful inquiry and a constant endeavour, that they may know and do their duty. 1st. They must seek the Lord, seek his favour and grace, address to him upon all occasions, ask of him what they need, seek him early, seek him diligently, and continue seeking him. 2nd. They must seek righteousness; seek to God for the performance of his promises to you, and see to it that you abound yet more in duty to him, seek for the righteousness of Christ to be imputed to you, for the graces of God's Spirit to be implanted in you; hunger and thirst after it. 3rd. They must seek meekness. This is a grace they were so eminent for that they were denominated the meek of the land, and yet this they must seek. Note, Those that are never so good must still strive to be better, that have never so much grace must be still praying and labouring for more. Nay, they that excel in any particular grace must still seek to excel yet more in that, because in that most assaults will be made upon them by their enemies, and in that most is expected from them by their friends, and in that they are most apt to be themselves secure. Si dixisti sufficit, periisti,—'Say but, I am all that I ought to be, and you are undone.' In the difficult, trying times approaching, the meek will find exercise for all the meekness they have, and all little enough, and therefore should seek it earnestly, and pray that when God in his providence gives them occasion for it, he would by his grace enable them to exercise it, "to shew all meekness to all men," in all instances; that "as the day is, so may the strength be."

Fourthly. Encouragements given to take these directions; "It may be you shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." 1. You particularly that are the meek of the earth; though the day of the Lord's anger do come upon the land, yet you shall be safe, you shall be taken under special protection, verily "it shall be well with thy remnant," Jer. xv. 11; "Thy life will I give unto thee for a prey," Jer. xlv. 5; "I will deliver thee in that day," Jer. xxxix. 17. "It may be you shall be hid;" if any be hid, you shall. Good men cannot be sure of temporal preservation, for all things come alike to all; but they are most likely to be hid, and stand fairest for a distinguishing care of providence. It is expressed thus doubtfully, to try if they will trust the goodness of God's nature, though they have but the "it may be" of a promise; and to keep up in them a holy fear and watchfulness, lest they should seem to come short, and should do any thing to throw themselves out of the Divine protection. Note, Those that hold fast their integrity in times of common iniquity have reason to hope that God will find out a hiding-place for them, where they shall be safe and easy in times of common calamity. They shall be hid, as Luther said, aut in cœlo, aut sub cœlo,—'either in heaven or under heaven;' either in the possession of heaven or under the protection of heaven. Or, 2. You of this nation, though it be a nation not desired, yet in the day of the Lord's anger with the neighbour nations, when his judgments are abroad, you shall be hid, your land shall be preserved for the sake of those few meek ones that stand in the gap, to turn away the wrath of God. It concerns us all to make it sure to ourselves that we shall be hid in the great day of God's wrath; and if we hide ourselves in chambers of duty, God will hide us in chambers of safety, Isa. xxvi. 20. If we prepare an ark, that shall be our hiding-place, Gen. vii. 1.

4 For Gaza shall be forsaken, and Ashkelon a desolation:
They shall drive out Ashdod at the noon day,
And Ekron shall be rooted up.
5 Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea coast, the nation of the Cherethites!
The word of the LORD is against you; O Canaan, the land of the Philistines,
I will even destroy thee, that there shall be no inhabitant.
6 And the sea coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds,
And folds for flocks.
7 And the coast shall be for the remnant of the house of Judah;
They shall feed thereupon:
In the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down in the evening:
For the LORD their God shall visit them, and turn away their captivity.

The prophet here comes to foretell what share the neighbour nations should have in the destruction made upon those parts of the world by Nebuchadnezzar and his victorious Chaldees, as other of the prophets did at that time; which is designed, 1. To awaken the people of the Jews, by making them sensible how strong, how deep, how large, the inundation of calamities should be, that the day of the Lord that was near might appear the more dreadful, and they might thereby be quickened to prepare for it as for a general deluge. 2. To comfort them with this thought, that their case, though sad, should not be singular, (solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris,—'the wretched find it consolatory to have companions of their woe,') and much more with this, that though God had seemed to be their enemy, and to fight against them, yet he was still so far their friend, and an enemy to their enemies, that he resented and would revenge the indignities done them.

In these verses we have the doom of the Philistines, that were near neighbours and old enemies to the people of Israel. Five lordships there were in that country; only four are here named, Gaza and Ashkelon, Ashdod and Ekron. Gath, the fifth, is not named; some think because it was now subject to Judah. They were the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, ver. 5, for their country lay upon the Great Sea. The nation of the Cherethites is here joined with them, which bordered upon them, 1 Sam. xxx. 14, and fell with them, as is foretold also, Eze. xxv. 16. The Philistines' land is here called Canaan, for it belonged to that country which God gave to his people Israel, and was inserted in the grant made to them, Jos. xiii. 3. This land is yet possessed by five lords of the Philistines; so that they wrongfully kept Israel out of the possession of it, Jud. iii. 3, which is now remembered against them; for, though others' rights may be long detained unjustly, the righteous God will at length avenge the wrong.

First. It is here foretold, that the Philistines, the usurpers, shall be dispossessed and quite extirpated. In general, here is a "Woe to them," ver. 5, which, coming from God, speaks all misery; "The word of the Lord is against them;" the word of the former prophets, which, though not yet accomplished, will be in its season, Isa. xiv. 31. This word now, by this prophet, is against them. Note, Those are really in a woful condition that have the word of the Lord against them; for no word of his shall fall to the ground. They that rebel against the precepts of God's word shall have the threatenings of the word against them. The effect will be no less than their destruction. 1. God himself will be the author of it; "I will even destroy thee," who can make good what he saith, and will. 2. It shall be a universal destruction, it shall extend itself to all parts of the land, both city and country. "Gaza shall be forsaken," though now a populous city. It was foretold, Jer. xlvii. 5, that baldness should come upon Gaza: Alexander the Great razed that city, and we find, Acts viii. 26, that Gaza was a desert. Ashkelon shall be a desolation, a pattern of desolation. "Ashdod shall be driven out at noon-day;" in the extremity of the scorching heat they shall have no shade, no shelter to protect them; but then, when most incommoded by the weather, they shall be forced away into captivity, which will be an aggravating circumstance of it. Ekron likewise shall be rooted up, that had been long taking root. The land of the Philistines shall be dispeopled; "there shall be no inhabitant," ver. 5. God made the earth to be inhabited, Isa. xlv. 18, otherwise he had made it in vain; but if men do not answer the end of their creation in serving God, it is just with God that the earth should not answer the end of its creation in serving them for an habitation. Man's sin hath sometimes subjected it to this vanity. 3. It shall be an utter destruction. The sea-coast that used to be a harbour for ships, and a habitation for merchants, shall now be deserted, and be only cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks, ver. 6; and then, perhaps, put to better use than when it was possessed by the Philistines.

Secondly. It is here foretold that the house of Judah, the rightful owners, shall recover the possession of it, ver. 7. The remnant of them that shall return out of captivity, when God visits them, shall be made to lie down in safety in the houses of Ashkelon, to lie down in the evening when they are weary and sleepy. There they shall feed themselves and their flocks. Note, God will at length restore his people to their rights, though they may be long kept out from them.

8 I have heard the reproach of Moab,
And the revilings of the children of Ammon,
Whereby they have reproached my people,
And magnified themselves against their border.
9 Therefore as I live, saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel,
Surely Moab shall be as Sodom,
And the children of Ammon as Gomorrah,
Even the breeding of nettles, and saltpits, and a perpetual desolation:

SALT-PITS.

The residue of my people shall spoil them,
And the remnant of my people shall possess them.
10 This shall they have for their pride,
Because they have reproached and magnified themselves
Against the people of the LORD of hosts.
11 The LORD will be terrible unto them:
For he will famish all the gods of the earth;
And men shall worship him, every one from his place,
Even all the isles of the heathen.

The Moabites and Ammonites were both of the posterity of Lot; their countries joined, and both adjoining to Israel, they are here put together in the prophecy against them.

First. They are both charged with the same crime, and that was reproaching and reviling the people of God, and triumphing in their calamities; ver. 8, "They have reproached my people." While God's people kept close to their duty, it is probable they reproached them for the singularities of their religion; and now they had revolted from God, and were fallen under his displeasure, they reproached them for that too. It has been the common lot of God's people in all ages to be reproached and reviled upon one account or other; thus the old serpent spits his venom; and pride is at the bottom of it. It is in their pride that they have "magnified themselves against the people of the Lord of hosts," thinking themselves as good as they, as great, and every way as happy. It is the contempt of the proud that God's people are filled with, Ps. cxxiii. 4. They have 'spoken big' (so some read it, magni locuti sunt,—'they have spoken great things,') "against their border," ver. 8, against those of them that bordered upon their country, whom upon all occasions they insulted; or, against the property they claimed, which they disputed, or the protection they boasted of, which they ridiculed. They spoke big against the people of the Lord of hosts, as a deserted, abandoned people; great swelling words of vanity are the genuine language of the church's enemies. But I have heard them, saith God, and will let you know that I have heard them. I have heard, and I will reckon for them, Jude 15. And if God hears the reproaches and revilings we are under, it is a good reason why we should be as a deaf man that hears not, Ps. xxxviii. 14, 15. Nay, God not only takes notice of, but interests himself in, the reproaches cast on his people, because they are his; and it is certain they who look with disdain upon the people of the Lord of hosts thereby dishonour the Lord of hosts himself. See this very thing charged on Moab and Ammon, Eze. xxv. 3, 8.

Secondly. They are both laid under the same doom. Associates in iniquity may expect to be so in desolation. See with what solemnity sentence is pronounced upon them, ver. 9. It is the Lord of hosts, the sovereign Lord of all, who has authority to pass this sentence, and ability to execute it; it is the God of Israel, who is jealous for their honour; it is he that has said it, nay, he hath sworn it, "As I live, saith the Lord." The sentence is, 1. That the Moabites and Ammonites shall be quite destroyed. They shall be as Sodom and as Gomorrah, the marks of whose ruins in the Dead Sea lay near adjoining to the countries of Moab and Ammon; they shall, though not by the same means, even fire from heaven, yet almost in the same manner, be laid waste, not again to be inhabited, or not for a long time. The country shall produce nothing but nettles instead of corn, and there shall be brine pits instead of the pleasant fountains of water with which the country had abounded. 2. That Israel shall be too hard for them, shall spoil them of their goods, and possess their country by lawful war. Note, Proud men sometimes, by the just judgment of God, fall under the mortification of being trampled upon themselves by those whom, when time was, they haughtily trampled upon. And this they shall have for their pride.

Thirdly. Other nations shall in like manner be humbled, that the Lord alone may be exalted; ver. 11, The Lord will be terrible unto the Moabites and Ammonites in particular, who have made themselves a terror to his Israel. For, 1. Heathen gods must be abolished. They have long had possession, and their worshippers have both glorified them and gloried in them; but the Lord will famish all the gods of the earth, will starve them out of their strongholds. The pagans had a fond conceit that their idols were regaled by their offerings, and did eat the fat of their sacrifices, Deu. xxxii. 38; omnia comesta a Belo,—'Bel has eaten all.' But it is here promised that when the Christian religion is set up in the world, men shall be turned from the service of these dumb idols, shall forsake their altars, and bring no more sacrifices to them, and thus they shall be famished, or made lean, as the word is; their priests shall. This speaks the vanity of these idols; it lies in the power of their worshippers to famish them; whereas the true God saith, "If I were hungry, I would not tell thee." It speaks also the victory of the God of Israel over them, "Now know we that he is greater than all gods." 2. Heathen nations must be converted; when the Gospel gets ground, by it men shall be brought to worship him who lives for ever, for that is the command of the everlasting Gospel, Rev. xiv. 7; "Every one from his place;" they shall not need to go up to Jerusalem to worship the God of Israel, but wherever they are they may have access to him; "I will that men pray everywhere." God shall be worshipped, not only by all the tribes of Israel, and the strangers who join themselves to them, but by "all the isles of the heathen." This is a promise which looks favourably upon our native country, for it is one of the most considerable of the isles of the Gentiles, by which God will be glorified.

12 Ye Ethiopians also,
Ye shall be slain by my sword.
13 And he will stretch out his hand against the north,
And destroy Assyria;
And will make Nineveh a desolation,
And dry like a wilderness.
14 And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her,
All the beasts of the nations:

PELICANS, OR CORMORANTS.
1119

Both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it;
Their voice shall sing in the windows;
Desolation shall be in the thresholds:
For he shall uncover the cedar work.
15 This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly, [me:
That said in her heart, I am, and there is none beside
How is she become a desolation,
A place for beasts to lie down in! [hand.
Every one that passeth by her shall hiss, and wag his

The cup is going round, when Nebuchadnezzar is going on conquering and to conquer, and not only Israel's near neighbours, but those that lay more remote, must be reckoned with for the wrongs they had done to God's people. The Ethiopians and the Assyrians are here taken to task.

First. The Ethiopians, or Arabians, that had sometimes been a terror to Israel, as in Asa's time, 2 Chr. xiv. 9, must now be reckoned with. They "shall be slain by my sword," ver. 12. Nebuchadnezzar was God's sword, the instrument in his hand, with which these and other enemies were subdued and punished, Ps. xvii. 14.

Secondly. The Assyrians, and Nineveh, the head city of their monarchy, are next set to the bar to receive their doom. He that is God's sword will "stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria," and make himself master of it. Assyria had been the rod of God's anger against Israel, and now Babylon is the rod of God's anger against Assyria, Isa. x. 5. He will "make Nineveh a desolation," as had been lately and largely foretold by the prophet Nahum. Observe,

1. How flourishing Nineveh's state had formerly been; ver. 15, "This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly." Nineveh was so strong that she feared no evil, and therefore dwelt carelessly, and set danger at defiance; was so rich, that she thought herself sure of all good, and therefore was a rejoicing city, full of mirth and gaiety; and had such a dominion, that she admitted no rival, but said in her heart, "I am, and there is none besides me," that can compare with me, no city in the world that can pretend to be equal with me. God can with his judgments frighten the most secure, humble the most haughty, and mar the mirth of those that laugh most now.

2. How complete Nineveh's ruin shall now be. It shall be made a desolation, ver. 13. Such a heap of ruins shall this once pompous city be, that it shall be, 1st. A receptacle for beasts, such a wilderness that flocks shall lie down in it; nay, such a waste, desolate, frightful place, that wild beasts, the beasts of the nations, all kinds of beasts, shall take up their abode there; the melancholy birds, as the cormorant and bittern, shall make their nests in what remains of the houses, as they sometimes do in old ruinous buildings that are uninhabited and unfrequented. The lintels, or chapiters of the pillars, the windows and thresholds, and all the fine cedar work curiously engraven, shall lie exposed; and on them these rueful, ominous birds shall perch, and their voice shall sing. How are the songs of mirth turned into hideous, horrid noises! What little reason have men to be proud of stately buildings, and rich furniture, when they know not what all the pomp of them may come to at last. 2nd. A derision to travellers. They that had come from far to gratify their curiosity with the sight of Nineveh's splendour shall now look on her with as much contempt as ever they looked upon her with admiration; ver. 15, "Every one that passeth by shall hiss" at her, "and wag his hand," making light of her desolations, nay, and making sport with them; there is an end of proud Nineveh. They shall not weep and wring their hands, their adversities are unpitied and unlamented that were insolent and haughty in their prosperity; but they shall hiss and wag their hands, forgetting that perhaps their own ruin is not far off.

CHAPTER III.

We now return to Jerusalem, and must again hear what God has to say to her, I. By way of reproof and threatening, for the abundance of wickedness that was found in her, of which divers instances are given, with the aggravations of them, ver. 1—7. II. By way of promise of mercy and grace, which God had yet in reserve for them. Two general heads of promises here are: 1. That God would bring in a glorious work of reformation among them, cleanse them from their sins, and bring them home to himself: many promises of this kind here are, ver. 8—13; 2. That he would bring about a glorious work of salvation for them, when he had thus prepared them for it, ver. 14—20. Thus the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and, to clear his own way, shall turn away ungodliness fron Jacob. These promises were to have their full accomplishment in gospel times and gospel graces.

WOE to her that is filthy and polluted,
To the oppressing city!
2 She obeyed not the voice;
She received not correction;
She trusted not in the LORD; she drew not near to her God.
3 Her princes within her are roaring lions;
Her judges are evening wolves;
They gnaw not the bones till the morrow.
4 Her prophets are light and treacherous persons:
Her priests have polluted the sanctuary,
They have done violence to the law.
5 The just LORD is in the midst thereof;
He will not do iniquity:
Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light, he faileth not;
But the unjust knoweth no shame.
6 I have cut off the nations; their towers are desolate;

I made their streets waste, that none passeth by:
Their cities are destroyed, so that there is no man,
That there is none inhabitant.
7 I said, Surely thou wilt fear me, thou wilt receive instruction;
So their dwelling should not be cut off, howsoever I punished them:
But they rose early, and corrupted all their doings.

STREET OF AN ANCIENT CITY, POMPEII.—FROM MODEL AT SIR. J. SOANE'S MUSEUM.

One would wonder that Jerusalem, the holy city, where God was known, and his name was great, should be the city of which this black character is here given; that a place that enjoyed such plenty of the means of grace should become so very corrupt and vicious, and that God should permit it to be so; yet so it is, to shew that the law made nothing perfect. But, if this be the true character of Jerusalem, as no doubt it is, for God's justice will make none worse than they are, it is no wonder that the prophet begins with "Woe to her," for the holy God hates sin in those that are nearest to him, nay, in them he hates it most. A sinful state is, and will be, a woful state.

First. Here is a very ill character given of the city in general. How is the faithful city become a harlot! 1. She shames herself. She is filthy and polluted, has made herself infamous, (so some read it,) ver. 1; the gluttonous city, (so the margin,) always cramming, and making provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts of it. Sin is the filthiness and pollution of persons and places, and makes them odious in the sight of the holy God. 2. She wrongs her neighbours and inhabitants; she is the oppressing city. Never any place had statutes and judgments so righteous as this city had, and yet in the administration of the government never was more unrighteousness. 3. She is very provoking to her God, and in every respect walks contrary to him, ver. 2. He has given his law, and spoken to her by his servants the prophets, telling her what is the good she should do, and what the evil she should avoid; but she obeyed not his voice, nor made conscience of doing as he commanded her, in any thing. He has taken her under an excellent discipline, both of the word and of the rod, but she did not receive the instruction of the one or the correction of the other; did not submit to God's will, nor answer his end in either. He encouraged her to depend upon him, and his power and promise, for deliverance from evil, and supply with good, but "she trusted not in the Lord;" her confidence was placed in her alliances with great nations more than in her covenant with God. He gave her tokens of his presence, and instituted ordinances of communion for her with himself, but "she drew not near to her God," did not meet him where he appointed, and where he promised to meet her. She stood at a distance, and said to the Almighty, "Depart."

Secondly. Here is a very ill character of the leading men in it. Those that should, by their influence, suppress vice and profaneness there, are the wicked patterns and patrons of it; and those that should be her physicians are really her worst disease. 1. Her princes are ravenous and barbarous as roaring lions, that make a prey of all about them, and are universally feared and hated; they use their power for destruction, and not for edification. 2. Her judges, that should be the protectors of injured innocence, are evening wolves, rapacious and greedy, and their cruelty and covetousness both insatiable. They gnaw not the bones till the morrow; they take so much delight and pleasure in cruelty and oppression that, when they have devoured a good man, they reserve the bones, as it were, for a sweet morsel, to be gnawed the next morning, Job xxxi. 31. 3. Her prophets, that pretended to be special messengers from heaven to them, were light and treacherous persons, fanciful and of a vain imagination, frothy and airy, and of a loose conversation; men of no consistency with themselves, nor that one could put any confidence in. They were so given to bantering that it was hard to say when they were serious. Their pretended prophecies were all a sham, and they secretly laughed at those that were deluded by them. 4. Her priests, that were teachers by office, and had the charge of the holy things, were false to their trust, and betrayed it. They were to preserve the purity of the sanctuary, but they did themselves pollute it, and the sacred offices of it which they were to attend upon; such priests as Hophni and Phineas, that by their wicked lives made the sacrifices of the Lord to be abhorred. They were to expound and apply the law, and to judge according to it, but in their explications and applications of it they did violence to the law; they corrupted the sense of it, and perverted it to the patronizing of that which was directly contrary to it. By forced constructions they made the law speak what they pleased, to serve a turn, and so in effect made void the law.

Thirdly. We have here the aggravations of this general corruption of all orders and degrees of men in Jerusalem.

1. They had the tokens of God's presence among them, and all the advantages that could be of knowing his will, with the strongest inducements possible to do it, and yet they persisted in their disobedience, ver. 5. 1. They had the honour and privilege of the Shechinah, God's dwelling in their land, so as he dwelt not with any other people. "The just Lord is in the midst" of thee, to take cognizance of all thou dost amiss, and give countenance to all thou dost well. He is in the midst of thee as a holy God, and therefore thy pollutions are the more offensive, Deu. xxiii. 14. He is in the midst of thee as a just God, and therefore will punish the affronts you put upon him, and the wrongs and injuries you do to one another. 2. They had God's own example set before them, in the discovery he made of himself to them, that they might conform to it. "He will not do iniquity," and therefore you shall not; for this was the great rule of their institution, Be ye holy, for I am holy. God will be true to you, be not you then false to him. 3. He sent to them his prophets, rising up early and sending them. "Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light," as duly as the morning comes, he faileth not; he shews them plainly what the good is he requires of them, and puts them in mind of it. He wakeneth morning by morning, Isa. l. 4; wakens his prophets with the rising sun, to bring to light the things which belonged to their peace. So that, upon the whole matter, what more could have been done to his vineyard to make it fruitful? Isa. v. 4; and yet, after all, the unjust know no shame; they that have been unjust are unjust still, and are not ashamed of their unrighteousness, neither can they blush. If they had any sense of honour, any shame left in them, they would not go so directly contrary to their profession, and to the instructions given them. But they that are past shame are past cure.

2. God has set before their eyes some remarkable monuments of his justice, which were designed for warnings to them; ver. 6, "I have cut off the nations," the seven nations of Canaan, which the land spewed out for their wickedness; upon which they had this caution given to them, to "take heed lest it spew out them also," Lev. xviii. 28. Or it may refer to some of the neighbour nations, that were made desolate for their wickedness, especially to the nation of Israel, the ten tribes; their towers were desolate, their high towers, their strong towers, their pride and power broken, their streets wasted, so that none passed along through them; their cities were destroyed and laid in ruins, no man was to be found in them, no inhabitant, all were slain or carried into captivity. The enemies did it, but God avows it: I cut them off, saith he. And God designed this for an admonition to Jerusalem; Eze. xxiii. 9, 11, "I said, Surely thou wilt fear me;" surely these judgments upon others will deter thee from the like wicked practices; "surely thou wilt receive instruction" by these providences; it ought reasonably to be expected that thou wouldst not continue to sin like the nations when thou seest the ruin which their sin has brought upon them. They could not but see their own house in danger when their neighbour's was on fire; and when we are frightened, God should be feared.

3. He had set before them life and death, good and evil, both in his word and in his providence. 1. He had assured them of the continuance of their prosperity, if they would fear him, and receive instruction; for "so their dwelling would not be cut off," as their neighbour's was,—if they took the warning given them, and reformed, what was past should be pardoned, and their tranquillity lengthened out. 2. He had made them feel the smart of the rod, though he reprieved them from the sword; "Howsoever I punished them," that being chastened they might not be condemned. Such various methods did God take with them to reclaim them, but all in vain,—they were not to be won upon by gentle methods, nor had severe ones any effect, for "they rose early, and corrupted all their doings." They were more resolute and eager in their wicked courses than ever, more studious and solicitous in making provision for their lusts, and let slip no opportunity for the gratification of them. God rose up early to send them his prophets, to reduce and reclaim them; but they were up before him, to shut and bolt the door against them. Their wickedness was universal,—all their doings were corrupted, and it was all along of themselves; they could not lay the blame upon the tempter, but they alone must bear it. They themselves wilfully and designedly "corrupted all their doings," for "every man is tempted when he is drawn aside of his own lust, and enticed."

8 Therefore wait ye upon me, saith the LORD,
Until the day that I rise up to the prey:
For my determination is to gather the nations,
That I may assemble the kingdoms,
To pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger:
For all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy.
9 For then will I turn to the people a pure language,
That they may all call upon the name of the LORD,
To serve him with one consent.
10 From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants,
Even the daughter of my dispersed,
Shall bring mine offering.
11 In that day shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings,
Wherein thou hast transgressed against me;
For then I will take away out of the midst of thee them that rejoice in thy pride,
And thou shalt no more be haughty because of my holy mountain.
12 I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people,
And they shall trust in the name of the LORD.
13 The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak [lies;

Neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth: For they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid.

Things looked very bad with Jerusalem in the foregoing verses; she has got into a very ill name, and seems to be incorrigible, incurable, mercy proof and judgment proof. Now one would think it should follow,—therefore expect no other but that she should be utterly abandoned and rejected, as reprobate silver. Since they will not be wrought upon by prophets or providences, let them be made a desolation, as their neighbours have been. But behold and wonder at the riches of Divine grace, which takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious. They still grew worse and worse; "Therefore, wait ye upon me, saith the Lord," ver. 8; since the law it seems will make nothing perfect, the bringing in of a better hope shall. Let those that lament the corruptions of the church wait upon God, till he send his Son into the world to save his people from their sins,—till he send his Gospel to reform and refine his church, and to purify to himself a peculiar people, both of Jews and Gentiles. And there were those who, according to this direction and encouragement, waited for redemption, for this redemption, in Jerusalem, and long looked for it came at last, Lu. ii. 38. For judgment Christ will come into this world, Jno. ix. 39.

First. To avenge what has been done amiss against his church, to bring down and destroy the enemies of it,—its spiritual enemies, of which the destruction of Babylon, and other the oppressors of God's people, in the Old Testament times, was a type, and would be a happy presage. He will rise up to the prey, to lead captivity captive, Ps. lxviii. 18, to conquer and spoil the powers of darkness, and the powers on earth, that set themselves "against the Lord and his Anointed." He will "break them with a rod of iron," Ps. ii. 5, 9; xi. 5, 6. His determination is to gather the nations, and to assemble the kingdoms. By the Gospel of Christ preached to every creature all nations are summoned, as it were, to appear in a body before the Lord Jesus, who is about to set up his kingdom in the world. But, since the greatest part of mankind will not obey the summons, he will pour upon them his indignation; for he that "believes not is condemned already." At the time of the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah there shall be on earth "distress of nations with perplexity," Lu. xxi. 25; great tribulation, such as never was or ever shall be, Mat. xxiv. 21. Then God pours upon the nations his indignation, even all his fierce anger, for their indignation and fierce anger against the Messiah and his kingdom, Ps. ii. 1, 2. Then "all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of his jealousy," both Jews and Gentiles shall be reckoned with for their enmity to the Gospel. Principalities and powers shall be spoiled and made a shew of openly, and the victorious Redeemer shall triumph over them. Those that continue to be of the earth, and to mind earthly things, after God has set up the kingdom of heaven among men, "their end shall be destruction," Phil. iii. 19; they shall be "devoured with the fire of God's jealousy."

Secondly. To amend what he finds amiss in his church. When God intends the restoration of Israel, and the revival of their peace and prosperity, he makes way for it by their reformation, and the revival of their virtue and piety; for this is God's method, both with particular persons and with communities, first to make them holy, and then to make them happy. These promises were in part accomplished, after the return of the Jews out of Babylon, when by their captivity they were thoroughly cured of their idolatry; and this was all the fruit, even the taking away of sin. But it looks farther, to the blessed effects of the Gospel, and the grace of it, to those times of reformation we live in, Heb. ix. 10.

1. It is promised that there shall be a reformation in men's discourse, which had been generally corrupt, but should now be with grace seasoned with salt; ver. 9, "Then will I turn to the people a pure language;" that is, I will turn the people to such a language, from that evil communication which had almost ruined all good manners among them. Note, Converting grace refines the language, not by making the phrases witty, but the substance wise. Among the Jews, after the captivity, there needed a reformation of the dialect; for they had mingled the language of Canaan with that of Ashdod, Neh. xiii. 24, and that grievance shall be redressed. But that is not all; their language shall be purified from all profaneness, filthiness, and falsehood. I will turn to them a choice language, so some read it; they shall not speak rashly, but with caution and deliberation; they shall choose out their words. Note, An air of purity and piety in common conversation is a very happy omen to any people. Other graces, other blessings, shall be given where God gives a pure language to those that have been a people of unclean lips.

2. That the worship of God, according to his will, shall be more closely applied to, and more unanimously concurred in. Instead of sacrifice and incense, they shall call upon the name of the Lord. Prayer is the spiritual offering with which God must be honoured; and to prepare and fit us for that duty it is necessary that we have a pure language. We are utterly unfit to take God's name into our lips, unless they be pure lips. The purifying of the language in common conversation is necessary to the acceptableness of the words of our mouth, and the meditation of our heart in our devotion; for how can sweet waters and bitter come out of the same fountain? Jas. iii. 9—12. It is likewise promised, that, their language being thus purified, they shall serve God with one consent, with one shoulder, so the word is, alluding to oxen in the yoke, that draw even. When Christians are unanimous in the service of God the work goes on cheerfully. This is the effect of the pure language, purified from passion, envy, and censoriousness. Note, Purity is the way to unity, the reformation of manners the way to a comprehension. The wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable.

3. That those that were driven from God should return to him, and be accepted of him; ver. 10, "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia," that is, from Egypt, so described, Isa. xviii. 1, or from some other very remote country, "my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering." Those that by reason of their distance had almost forgotten God, and their obligations to him, shall be put in mind of him, as the prodigal son was of his father's house, in the far country. Those that, by reason of their dispersion under the tokens of his displeasure, might be afraid of coming to him, yet even they shall be gathered under his wings. The daughter of his dispersed that is afar off will be found among those whom the Lord our God shall call; and though they are dispersed he will own them for his. His calling them "My dispersed" puts honour upon them, sufficient to balance all the disgrace of their dispersion. These shall come, 1. With their humble petitions; "They are my suppliants." Note, True converts are supplicants to God; they do not plead, but "make supplication to their Judge," Job ix. 15; and wherever they are, though beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, a great way off from the house of prayer, he has his eye upon them, and his ear open to them; they are his suppliants. 2. With their spiritual sacrifices. They shall bring mine offering,—shall bring themselves as spiritual sacrifices to God, Rom. xii. 1. The conversion of the Gentiles is called "the offering up of the Gentiles," Rom. xv. 16; and with themselves they shall bring the gospel sacrifices of prayer, and praise, and alms, with which God is well pleased.

4. That sin and sinners shall be purged out from among them, ver. 11. God will take away, 1. Their just reproach; "In that day shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings." They shall be ashamed as penitents, and shall continue to be so, (see Eze. xvi. 63,) but they shall not be ashamed as sinners that return to folly again. "Thou shalt not be ashamed," that is, thou shalt no more do a shameful thing, as thou hast done. The guilt of sin being taken away by pardoning mercy, the reproach of it shall be rolled away from the sinner's own conscience, that being purified, and pacified, and cleansed from dead works. When wickedness and wicked people abound in a nation, those few in it that are good are ashamed of them and of their land; but when sinners are converted, and the land reformed, that shame, and the cause of it, are removed. 2. Their unjust glorying; "I will take away out of the midst of thee," not only the profane that are a shame to thy land, but the hypocrites that appear beautiful outwardly, and rejoice in thy pride, in the holy city, the holy house. These were indeed Israel's glory, but they made them their pride, and rejoiced in them, as if they were an invincible bulwark to secure them in their sinful ways; they relied on them as their righteousness and strength, boasting of "the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord," Jer. vii. 4; they were "haughty because of the holy mountain;" were conceited of themselves, scornful of others, and set even the judgments of God at defiance. Note, Church privileges, when they are not duly improved as they ought to be, are often made the matter of man's pride, and the ground of their security. But that haughtiness is of all other the most offensive to God which is supported and fed by the pretensions of holiness. This God will silence and take away.

5. That God will have a remnant of holy, humble, serious people among them, that shall have the comfort of their relation to him, and interest in him; ver. 12, "I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people." When the Chaldeans carried away the Jews into captivity, they left of the poor of the land for vine-dressers and husbandmen, a type and figure of God's distinguished remnant, whom he sets apart for himself,—they are afflicted, and poor, and low in the world; such God hath chosen, Jas. ii. 5. The poor are evangelized, low in their own eyes, afflicted for sin, poor in spirit. They are God's leaving; for it is a "remnant according to the election of grace; I have reserved them to myself," saith God, Rom. xi. 4, 5, and "they shall trust in the name of the Lord." Note, Those whom God designs for the glory of his name he enables to trust in his name; and the greater their affliction and poverty in the world is, the more reason they see to trust in God, having nothing else to trust to, 1 Tim. v. 5.

6. That this select remnant shall be blessed with purity and peace, ver. 13. 1st. They shall be blessed with purity, both in words and actions. They shall neither do iniquity nor speak lies; justice and veracity shall command them, and govern them, though it be never so much against their secular interest. They shall not only not speak a direct deliberate lie, but "there shall not be a deceitful tongue found in their mouth," not in the mouth of any of them; not the least equivocation shall come from them. 2nd. They shall be blessed with peace. They shall, as the sheep of God's pasture, feed and lie down, and "none shall make them afraid." They shall not be fearful themselves, nor shall any about them be frightful to them. Note, Those that are careful not to do iniquity need not be afraid of any calamity, for it cannot hurt them, and therefore should not terrify them.

14 Sing, O daughter of Zion;
Shout, O Israel;
Be glad and rejoice with all the heart,
O daughter of Jerusalem.
15 The LORD hath taken away thy judgments,
He hath cast out thine enemy:
The king of Israel, even the LORD, is in the midst of thee:
Thou shalt not see evil any more.
16 In that day it shall be said to Jerusalem, Fear thou not:
And to Zion, Let not thine hands be slack.
17 The LORD thy God in the midst of thee is mighty;
He will save, he will rejoice over thee with joy;
He will rest in his love, he will joy over thee with singing.
18 I will gather them that are sorrowful for the solemn assembly,
Who are of thee,
To whom the reproach of it was a burden.
19 Behold, at that time I will undo all that afflict thee:
And I will save her that halteth, and gather her that was driven out;
And I will get them praise and fame
In every land where they have been put to shame.
20 At that time will I bring you again,
Even in the time that I gather you:
For I will make you a name and a praise
Among all people of the earth,
When I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the LORD.

After the promises of taking away of sin here follow promises of the taking away of trouble; for when the cause is removed the effect will cease: what makes a people holy will make them happy of course. The precious promises here made to the purified people were to have their full accomplishment in the comforts of the Gospel; in the hope, and much more in the enjoyment, of which they are here called upon, 1. To rejoice and sing; ver. 14, "Sing, O daughter of Zion," sing for joy, "shout, O Israel," in a holy transport and exultation. "Be glad and rejoice with all the heart;" let the joy be inward, let it be great. Those that love God with all their heart have occasion with all their heart to rejoice in him. It was promised, ver. 13, that their sins should be mortified, and these fears silenced, and then follows, Sing and rejoice. Note, Those that reform have cause to rejoice, whereas Israel cannot rejoice for joy, as other people, while she goes a whoring from her God. God's promises applied by faith furnish the saints with constant and abundant matter for joy; they are filled with joy and peace in believing them. 2. To throw off all their discouragements; ver. 16, "In that day it shall be said to Jerusalem,"—God will say it by his prophets, by his providences, their neighbours shall say it, they shall it to one another,—"Fear thou not," be not disposed to fear, do not easily admit the impressions of it; when things are bad fear not their being worse, but hope they will mend; frighten not thyself upon every occasion. "Let not thy hands be slack," or faint; wring not thy hands in despair, drop not thy hands in despondency, disfit not thyself for thy work and warfare by giving way to doubts and fears. Pluck up thy spirits; and in token of that lift up thy hands, "the hands that hung down," Heb. xii. 12; Isa. xxxv. 3. Lift up thy hands in prayer to God; lift up thy hands to help thyself. Fear makes the hands slack, but faith and hope make them vigorous; and the joy of the land will be our strength, both for doing and suffering.

Let us now see what these precious promises are, which are here made to the people of God, for the banishing of their griefs and fears, and the encouraging of their hopes and joys; and to us are these promises made as well as to them.

First. An end shall be put to all their troubles and distresses; ver. 15, "The Lord hath taken away thy judgments," hath removed all the calamities thou hast been groaning under, which were the punishments of thy sin. The noise of war shall be silenced, the reproach of famine done away, and the captivity brought back. Though some grievances remain, they shall be only afflictions, and not judgments, for sin shall be pardoned. "He hath cast out thine enemy," that has thrust himself into thy land, and triumphed over thee. He hath swept out thine enemy, so some read it, as dirt is swept out of the house to the dunghill. When they sweep out their sins with the besom of reformation God will sweep out their enemies with the besom of destruction. If they should need correction, they shall fall into the hands of the Lord, whose mercies are great, and shall not again fall into the hands of man, whose tender mercies are cruel. "Thou shalt not see evil any more," not such evil days as thou hast seen. Note, The way to get clear of the evil of trouble is to keep clear from the evil of sin; and to them that do so trouble has no real evil in it.

Secondly. God will give them the tokens of his presence with them. Though he has long seemed to stand at a distance, they having provoked him to withdraw, he will make it to appear that he is with them of a truth; "The Lord is in the midst of thee, O Zion," of thee, O Jerusalem, as the sun in the centre of the universe, to diffuse his light and influence upon every part. He is in the midst of thee, to preside in all thine affairs, and to take care of all thine interests. And, 1. He is the King of Israel, ver. 15; and is in the midst of thee, as a king in the midst of his people. With an eye to this, our Lord Jesus is called the King of Israel, Jno. i. 49; and he is, and will be, in the midst of his church always, even to the end of the world, to receive the homage of his subjects, and to give out his favours to them, even where but "two or three are gathered together in his name." 2. He is the Lord thy God, thine in covenant; and he is in the midst of thee as thy God, whom thou hast an interest in, and whose own thou art. He has put himself into dear relation to thee, laid himself by promise under obligations to thee; and, that thou mayst have abundant comfort in both, he is in the midst of thee, nigh at hand to answer both. 3. He that "is in the midst of thee," as thy God and King, is mighty, is almighty, is able to do all for thee that thou needest and canst desire. 4. He has engaged his power for thy succour; "He will save." He will be Jesus; he will answer the name, for he will save his people from their sins.

Thirdly. God will take delight in them, and in doing them good. The expressions of this are very lively and affecting; ver. 17, "He will rejoice over thee with joy;" will not only be well pleased with thee upon thy repentance and reformation, and take thee into favour, but will take a complacency in thee, as the bridegroom doth in his bride, or the bride in her ornaments, Isa. lxii. 3—5. The conversion of sinners, and the consolation of saints, is the joy of angels; for it is the joy of God himself. The church should be the joy of the whole earth, Ps. xlviii. 2, for it is the "joy of the whole heaven." He will rest in his love, will be silent in his love, so the word is; will not rebuke thee as I have done, for thy sins; will acquiesce in thee, and in my relation to thee. I know not where there is the like expression of Christ's love to his church, unless in that song of songs, Cant. iv. 5, "Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse, with one of thine eyes." O the condescensions of Divine grace! The great God not only loves his saints, but he loves to love them, is pleased that he has pitched upon these objects of his love. He "will joy over them with singing." He that is grieved for the sin of sinners, rejoiceth in the graces and services of the saints, and is ready to express that joy, by singing over them. "The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him;" and in them Jesus Christ will shortly be glorified and admired.

Fourthly. God will comfort Zion's mourners, that sympathize with her in her griefs, and will wipe away their tears; ver. 18, "I will gather them that are sorrowful for the solemn assemblies, to whom the reproach of it was a burthen." See, 1. Who they are whom God will rejoice in, and make to rejoice. They are such as are sorrowful; they only must expect to reap in joy that sow in tears. The sorrowful now shall be for ever joyful. 2. What is the great matter of sorrow to Zion's mourners, when Zion is in mourning. Many are her calamities, the city is ruined, the palaces demolished, trade is at an end, and the administration of public justice; but all these are nothing to them in comparison with the desolations of the sanctuary, the destruction of the temple and the altar, to attend on which, in solemn feasts, all Israel used to come together three times a year: it is for those sacred solemn assemblies that they are sorrowful. 1st. Because they are dispersed. There is no temple to come up to, or, if there were, no people to come up to it, so that the "solemn feasts and sabbaths are forgotten in Zion," Lam. ii. 6. Note, The restraining of public assemblies for religious worship, the scattering of them by their enemies, or the forsaking of them by their friends, so that either there are no assemblies, or not solemn ones, is a very sorrowful thing to all good people. If the ways of Zion mourn, the sons of Zion mourn too. And hereby they make it to appear that they are indeed of Zion, living members of that body with the grievances of which they are so sensibly affected. 2nd. Because they are despised. The reproach of the solemn assemblies is a burthen to them. It had been the lot of the solemn assemblies to lie under a great deal of reproach, Satan and his instruments having a particular spite at them, as the great support of the interests of God's kingdom among men. Black and odious characters have been put upon those assemblies; and this is a burthen to all those who have a cordial concern for the glory of God and the welfare of the souls of men. They reckon that the reproaches of those who reproach the solemn assemblies fall upon them, fall foul upon them.

Fifthly. God will recover the captives out of the hands of their oppressors, and bring home the banished that seemed to be expelled, ver. 19, 20. 1. Their enemies shall be disabled to detain them in bondage: "At that time I will undo all that afflict thee," will break their power, and blast their counsels, so that they shall be forced to surrender the prey they have taken. Conficiam,—'I will take them to task;' I will be doing with them shortly, and so as to make an end of them. Note, Those that abuse and oppress God's people take the ready way to undo themselves. 2. They shall be enabled to assert and recover their liberty, and all the difficulties in the way of it shall be surmounted. Is the church weak and wounded? "I will save her that halteth," as was promised, Mic. iv. 7. He will help her when she cannot help herself, even "the lame shall take the prey," Isa. xxxiii. 23. Is she dispersed, and not likely to incorporate for her common benefit? I will "gather her that was driven out, and bring her again at the time that I gather her;" one act of mercy and grace shall serve both to collect them out of their dispersions and conduct them to their own land. When the people's hearts are prepared, the work will be done suddenly; and who can hinder it, if God undertake to effect it? "I will turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the Lord;" you shall plainly discern the hand of God in it, and say, "This is the Lord's doing."

Sixthly. God will by all this put honour upon them, and gain them respect from all about them. Israel was at first "made high above all nations in praise and fame," Deu. xxvi. 19. The reproach brought upon them was therefore one of the sorest of their grievances,—nothing cuts deeper to those that are in honour than disgrace doth,—and therefore, when God returns in mercy to his church, it is here promised that she shall regain her credit; all the reproach shall be for ever rolled away, as Israel's at Gilgal, Jos. v. 9. The church shall be as honourable as ever she has been despicable. 1. Even those that have reproached her shall be made to respect her. "I will get them praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame," that the same who were the witnesses of their disgrace may see cause to change their mind concerning them. They that said, This is Zion, whom no man looketh after, shall say, This is Zion, whom the great God looks after: and she that was looked upon to be the offscouring of the earth now appears to be the darling of heaven. 2. Even those that never knew her shall be brought to honour her; ver. 20, "I will make you a name and a praise among all the people of the earth;" so the Jewish church was, when the fear of the Jews fell upon their neighbours, Esth. viii. 17; and some of all nations said, "We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23. So the Christian church was, when it was made to flourish in the world, for there is that in it which may justly recommend it to the value and esteem of all the people of the earth: and so the universal church of the firstborn will be in the great day, when the saints shall be brought together to Christ, that he may be admired and glorified in them, and they admired and glorified in him, before angels and men. Then will God's Israel be "made a name and a praise" to eternity.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES
TO THE BOOK OF ZEPHANIAH.

CHAP. II.—4. Gaza shall be forsaken. Supplementary Note, Jer. xlv. 5. Ashkelon a desolation: they shall drive out Ashdod; Ekron shall be rooted up. 6. And the sea-coasts shall be cottages for shepherds. Supplementary Note, Eze. xxv. 16. The ruins of white marble sometimes found at Gaza prove that it was formerly the abode of luxury and opulence. It has shared in the general destruction; and, notwithstanding its proud title of the capital of Palestine, it is now no more than a defenceless village, peopled by, at most, only two thousand inhabitants.—The sea-coast, by which it was formerly washed, is every day removing farther from the deserted ruins of Ashkelon.—Amidst the various successive ruins, those of Edzoud, (Ashdod,) so powerful under the Philistines, are now remarkable for their scorpions.—Volney's Travels.——In short, cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks, partially scattered along the sea-coasts, are now truly the best substitutes for populous cities that the once powerful realm of Philistia can produce; and the remnant of that land which gave titles and grandeur to the lords of the Philistines is destroyed. Gaza, the chief of its satrapies, 'the abode of luxury and opulence,' now bereaved of its king, and bald of all its fortifications, is the defenceless residence of a subsidiary ruler of a devastated province; and, in kindred degradation, ornaments of its once splendid edifices are now bedded in a wall that forms an inclosure for beasts. A handful of men could now take unobstructed possession of that place where a strong city opposed the entrance, and defied, for a time, the power, of the conqueror of the world. The walls, the dwellings, and the people of Ashkelon have all perished; and though its name was, in the time of the crusades, shouted in triumph throughout every land in Europe, it is now literally without an inhabitant. And Ashdod, which withstood a siege treble the duration of that of Troy, and thus outrivalled far the boast of Alexander at Gaza, has, in verification of "the word of God, which is sharper than any two-edged sword," been cut off, and has fallen before it to nothing. There is yet another city which was noted by the prophets, the very want of any information respecting which, and the absence of its name from several modern maps of Palestine, while the sites of other ruined cities are marked, are really the best confirmation of the truth of the prophecy that could possibly be given: Ekron shall be rooted up. It is rooted up. It was one of the chief cities of the Philistines; but though Gaza still subsists, and while Ashkelon and Ashdod retain their names in their ruins, the very name of Ekron is missing.—Keith on Prophecy. Since the above observations of Dr. Keith were written, Ekron has been inserted on one of the maps in Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible, most probably on the authority of Dr. Robinson, who describes the small Moslem village of Akri, five miles south of Ramleh, as occupying the situation of Ekron. This situation corresponds to all that is known of the ancient city; the radical letters of the Arabic name are the same as those of the Hebrew, and both the Christians and Moslems of the neighbourhood regard the site as the same. The village is built of unburnt bricks, and, as there are no apparent ruins, Ekron was probably of the same materials. It is alleged, however, that cisterns and the stones of handmills are often found at Akri, and the adjacent fields.—Cyclo. of Bib. Liter., art. Ekron. Nothwithstanding this, it is not the less certain that Ekron is rooted out. The very description of Akri, as occupying its site, and of the cisterns and stones of handmills being found there, and in the adjacent fields, are all the more striking proofs of this fact, and give but additional force to Dr. Keith's concluding words:—'The wonderful contrast in each particular, whether in respect to the land or to the cities of the Philistines, is the exact counterpart of the literal prediction; and, having the testimony of Volney to all the facts, and also indisputable evidence of the great priority of the predictions to the events, what more complete or clearer proof could there be, that each and all of them emanated from the prescience of Heaven?' 13—15. He will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness. Nineveh ceased to exist before what is usually considered the commencing date of authentic history. No mention of the place occurs in the narratives of the life and wars of Alexander, though the decisive action which destroyed the first Persian monarchy, and transferred the sceptre of the east into his hands, was fought in its locality. In the second century of the Christian era, Lucian expressly states, that so utterly had Nineveh been destroyed, that no vestige of it remained, nor could it be readily ascertained where it had once stood. In Gibbon's relation of the triumph of the emperor Heraclius over the troops of Chosroes, A.D. 627, he styles it the 'battle of Nineveh,' because fought on the vacant site of the city, which afforded a spacious field for the operations of the two armies. In a note he adds, that Niebuhr passed over Nineveh without perceiving it, mistaking for a natural ridge its grass-covered rampart of brick or earth. An old English traveller in the district quaintly remarks,—'Now it is destroyed, as God foretold it should be, by the Chaldeans, being nothing else than a sepulchre of her selfe.' Subsequently the presumed site of the city has been described by Kinneir, Buckingham, and Rich. Following the best authorities, ancient Nineveh may be generally described as differing from Babylon, which was built as a square, by being in the form of an immense parallelogram. It stood upon the Tigris, extending in length along its eastern bank, and in breadth from thence towards the Lycus, a tributary stream, the present Zab. Accordingly, guided by coincidence of position, the traditions of the country, and indications of a departed city, the site of Nineveh has been fixed on the side of the Tigris opposite Mosul, the head-quarters of a small Turkish pashalic, on the west bank of the Tigris. We cross to the eastern side by a bridge of boats, leading to the remnant of one of stone, at present extending over the space occupied by the river when in a flood. There are then before us two principal mounds, nearly due north and south of each other, called Tel Koyunjuk and Nebbi Yunus, distinctly visible from the opposite bank of the stream. Both are artificial elevations, clothed with grass, or otherwise cultivated, except where occupied by the dwellings of some villagers, and might be mistaken on a hasty glance for natural ground. The northern mound, Tel Koyunjuk, according to the measurement of Mr. Rich, is forty-three feet in perpendicular height, and seven thousand six hundred and ninety-one feet in circumference, of an irregular form, with steep sides and a level summit. Some years ago, upon excavating at this spot for stone to repair the bridge over the flood ground of the Tigris, the workmen opened a sepulchral chamber, in which was an inscription, and among bones and rubbish a woman's khalkhal or bracelet for the ancle, of silver, covered with torquoise-coloured rust; another differently formed of gold, called a hejil, being without bells; and a perfect bracelet of gold beads with pieces of engraved agate. The articles were disposed of, and the chamber obliterated in the work of farther excavation. Koyunjuk is called by the natives the Kalaa, or castle of Ninewe. The southern mound, Nebbi Yunus, or the prophet Jonah, was once the site of a monastery, named after the Divine messenger, from a tradition that Jonah preached on the spot. The hill itself is about fifty feet in perpendicular height above the level of the plain, and exceeds four hundred and thirty-one feet in length from east to west, and three hundred and fifty-five in breadth from north to south. Its antiquity and artificial character are attested by the remains found on digging into it, consisting of bricks and pottery with cuneiform inscriptions, one of which, more than a foot thick, and covered with writing, is now in the British museum. This is a summary of the knowledge obtained respecting the remains of Nineveh, down to the period of Mr. Rich's lamented death, who four times visited the spot during his stay at Bagdad as the English resident. In the year 1833, the French journals announced the success with which some excavations had been crowned, commenced by their consul, M. Botta, at the village of Khorsobad, about five hours of caravan journey eastward from Mosul. The village occupies a mound into which his workmen penetrated, and aided by fresh hands, supplied by the funds contributed by the French government, finally fifteen chambers were opened, some a hundred feet in length, evidently forming part of a stately palace. The walls of these chambers were sculptured with representations of historical events, and with writing in the cuneiform character, so placed as to leave no doubt that it contains explanations of the events described, and the names of the actors in them. Upon the discovery of these antiquities being reported to the French government, the sum of fifty thousand francs was granted to M. Botta for his private expenses, and a hundred thousand francs for that of excavating, while two artists, M. M. Costa and Flandin, were sent out to make drawings of unremovable sculptures, and a ship was despatched to Bussora for the purpose of transporting to Paris those that could be taken away. The return of this vessel to Havre, laden with the spoils of ancient architecture and art, has recently been announced; and a room on the ground-floor of the Louvre has been prepared for their reception, which is to bear the name of the salle de Nineveh. From Mosul, the river is descended in light craft or keleks, (see Supplementary Notes to Isa. xviii. 2,) of identical construction with the rafts described by Herodotus as common in this region in his day, more than two thousand years ago; and communicating westward with the Euphrates by numerous canals which are still traceable, and southward through the Persian Gulf with the Indian Ocean, Nineveh, by means of the Tigris, had ample facilities for the prosecution of commerce. The defiance of the prophet, "Thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of heaven," Nah. iii. 16, indicates the commercial habits of the people. We then arrive at the village of Nimroud, about six hours' journey from Mosul. The Turks generally believe this to have been Nimrod's own city, and one or two of the better informed, (says Mr. Rich, Koordistan, ii. 231,) with whom I conversed at Mosul, said it was Al Athur, or Ashur, from which the whole country was denominated. It is curious that the villagers still consider Nimrod as their founder. The village story-tellers have a book they call the Kisseh Nimrod, or Tales of Nimrod, with which they entertain the peasants on a winter night. This statement is remarkable, viewed in connection with the fact, that it still remains a vexed question with biblical philologists, whether the passage in Genesis, "Out of that land (Shinar) went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh," ought not rather to be rendered, as it is in the margin, 'Out of that land he (Nimrod) went forth into Ashur, (Assyria,) and builded Nineveh.' Regarded either way, it is singular to find an obscure place on the site of Nineveh, connected by name and local tradition with the first settler in the country. Upon opening a mound at this village, Mr. Layard found an entrance evidently into a building. The entrance was formed by two magnificent lions, winged and human-handed. Upon farther excavation, it led into a hall, a hundred and fifty feet long by thirty broad, from which several entrances, each formed by winged lions or bulls, led to other chambers, and successively fourteen were opened without the whole having been explored. He proceeded laboriously in his work maugre all impediments, and the British Museum now contains some of the results of his indefatigable researches. From these our artist has made several sketches. The whole of the marbles found are in perfect preservation, and the sculptures in relievo shew a degree of art far beyond that which the Egyptians had attained. We are reminded in these sculptures of the spirited descriptions of the chariots and horses, and warriors and drivers of Assyria, as given by Nahum. Three palaces have been discovered, one at Khorsabad by M. Botta, and two by Mr. Layard. The walls of the palace at Nimroud, whence the sculptures have been taken, are of unburnt brick or clay, incrusted with slabs of marble, eight inches thick and seven feet wide; the height is not at present ascertained, as the inscriptions were cut off to make the marbles more portable. These slabs were firmly united together by plugs of brass or wood, as well as wedge-shaped cramps, and each wall presented a record of the valour of the king, both in the war and the chase. There are nine of these in the Museum, the subjects of which are,—the attack of a fortified city,—the king drinking,—the king's chariot drawn by three horses,—the standard-bearer and charioteers of the great king,—the king in the van of a battle, riding in his chariot with his charioteer and shield-bearer,—a hawk-headed deity, seven feet high,—a bull hunt, the king in his chariot, with his huntsmen riding sideways on one horse, and leading another richly caparisoned,—a lion hunt, the king being in his chariot drawn by three horses, which the charioteer urges forward to escape a lion which has already placed his claw on the back of the chariot infuriated with the wounds of four arrows sticking in his body,—a league or treaty of peace, exhibiting two kings, both on foot,—and a colossal human-headed divinity. The historical part of these tablets is evidently designed to exhibit the exploits of one king, whose likeness is preserved throughout, and is doubtless a genuine portrait. The name may ultimately be discovered by deciphering the forthcoming inscriptions. Besides these, vases, drinking cups, chairs, tables, and other articles of domestic use, bracelets, earrings, and other personal ornaments, occur in the sculptures, and all designed in so bold a style, and beautifully finished. 'There are not a few points in the Scriptural account of Babylon and Nineveh which the sculptures of this subterranean edifice authenticate and verify. Babylon is described in the Bible as a land of graven images—a statement which would lead us to infer that in the country of Babylonia the arts were universally diffused, and had attained some degree of perfection. There is the most perfect accordance on this point between the pages of the Bible and the walls of this palace. We find mention made, too, of the "pleasant furniture" of Nineveh; and we find articles of this description frequently introduced in the bas-reliefs we have described. Moreover, the absence of every thing of value, and the marks of fire still visible on the edifice, make it apparent that it was first plundered and then burnt, as the prophet foretold. Little did the builders of this edifice imagine the singular fortune that awaited it,—that it should long outlast the Assyrian monarchy itself; and, after being buried for ages in darkness, should be brought forth to the light, to be the marvel of the last ages of the world, and to bear its testimony to matters of infinitely higher moment to man than the magnificence of the art with which it was so profusely decorated—even the supremacy and truth of that God who foretold by his prophets its destruction, and that of the power that flourished in it, ere yet a stone of it had been overthrown. Such (continues Wylie, in his work on Fulfilled Prophecy,) is the latter end of that city which repented in sackcloth and ashes at the preaching of Jonah—which Jehovah at that time spared—but which, returning to her former wickedness, was at last fearfully overthrown. Yet, as if the Divine indignation against Nineveh had begun of late to be mitigated, the aspect of her ruins is now of a less gloomy character than that which belongs to the remains of some other large cities. The scene is almost a pleasant and pastoral one. The dust of Nineveh sleeps beneath a fresh and beautiful turf. On some portions of the plain the plough has been busy for ages; and the ground is covered with crops of grain and cotton, which the niggard soil produces only on the alternate years. The rest of the plain is covered with green sward, dotted here and there with patches of tamarisk bushes. Here there is nothing of the scathed and blasted look which the plain of Chaldea presents, nor are there here those gigantic and hoary mounds which give such unspeakable sublimity to the site of Babylon. One has to reflect on the long line of monarchs and princes who flourished here—the stately palaces—the delicious gardens—the multitude of men—the wealth, the luxury, the wickedness of which this plain was once the abode, and to contrast it with its utter desertion now, and the deep and perpetual silence that reigns over it, before he can feel the truly sublime character of the scene on which he is gazing. Still, as we have said, there is, to this hour, some doubt regarding the site of Nineveh, which, however, it is probable will be speedily dispelled by the investigations going on there. If the remains we have described are the ruins of Nineveh, "how is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in!" If these are not the ruins of Nineveh, no man knows where it stood. In either case, how exact has been the fulfilment of the prophecy: "He will make an utter end of the place thereof!"'

CHAP. III.—10. From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants. See Supplementary Note on Nah. iii. 9. It is a well ascertained fact, though all the historical circumstances with which it is connected have not yet been brought to light, that there have long existed in the west of Abyssinia a people called Falashas, or emigrants, who maintain that they derived their origin from Palestine, and all of whom profess the Jewish religion. They are identified, as to physical traits, not with the African races living in Ethiopia, but with the tribes of Arabia. They have their own government conceded to them by the Negus, or king of Ethiopia. When Bruce was there they had a Jewish king named Gideon, and his queen, Judith. Considering how greatly the Christianity of Abyssinia has been mixed up with Judaism, there is every reason to believe that most of the early converts in that country belonged to this very people. That the Falashas are part of the dispersed people whose conversion is here predicted, I can have no doubt. They are singled out as a separate portion of the scattered seed of Abraham, most probably on account of the peculiar circumstances in which they have lived during the dispersion. Their bringing of Jehovah's offering does not necessarily imply that they are, on their conversion, to come with gifts to Jerusalem; all that is intended may only be the pure offering, which, under the new dispensation, was to be presented in every place: see Mal. i. 11; and compare ver. 9.—H.

REBUILDING THE TEMPLE.

AN

PROPHECY OF HAGGAI,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE captivity in Babylon gave a very remarkable turn to the affairs of the Jewish church, both in history and prophecy. It is made a signal epocha in our Saviour's genealogy, Mat. i. 17. Nine of the twelve minor prophets, whose oracles we have been hitherto consulting, lived and preached before that captivity; and most of them had an eye to it in their prophecies, foretelling it as the just punishment of Jerusalem's wickedness. But the last three (in whom the spirit of prophecy took its period, until it revived in Christ's forerunner,) lived and preached after the return out of captivity,—not immediately upon it, but some time after. Haggai and Zechariah appeared much about the same time—eighteen years after the return—when the building of the temple was both retarded by its enemies and neglected by its friends. "Then the prophets, Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo, prophesied unto the Jews that were in Jerusalem, in the name of the God of Israel, even unto them," so we read, Ezr. v. 1, to reprove them for their remissness, and to encourage them to revive that good work when it had stood still for some time, and to go on with it vigorously, notwithstanding the opposition they met with in it. Haggai began two months before Zechariah, who was raised up to second him, that out of the mouth of two witnesses the word might be established: but Zechariah continued longer at the work; for all Haggai's prophecies that are recorded were delivered within four months, in the second year of Darius, between the beginning of the sixth month and the end of the ninth; but we have Zechariah's prophecies dated above two years after, Zec. vii. 1. Some have the honour to lead, others to come last, in the work of God. The Jews ascribe to these two prophets the honour of being members of the great synagogue, as they call it, which was formed after the return out of captivity; we think it more certain, and it was their honour, and a much greater honour, that they prophesied of Christ. Haggai spoke of him as the glory of the latter house, and Zechariah as the Man, the Branch. In them the light of that morning star shone more bright than in the foregoing prophecies, as they lived nearer the time of the rising of the Sun of righteousness, and now began to see his day approaching. The Septuagint makes Haggai and Zechariah to be the penmen of Ps. cxxxviii., cxlvi., cxlvii., and cxlviii.

A.M. 3484. B.C. 520.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter, after the preamble of the prophecy, we have, I. A reproof of the people of the Jews for their dilatoriness and slothfulness in building the temple, which had provoked God to contend with them by the judgment of famine and scarcity; with an exhortation to them to resume that good work, and to prosecute it in good earnest, ver. 1—11. II. The good success of this sermon, appearing in the people's return and close application to that work, wherein the prophet, in God's name, animated and encouraged them, assuring them that God was with them, ver. 12—15.

IN the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month, came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet unto Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, saying, 2 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, saying, This people say, The time is not come, the time that the LORD's house should be built. 3 Then came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet, saying,

4 Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your cieled houses,
And this house lie waste?
5 Now therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Consider your ways.
6 Ye have sown much,
And bring in little;
Ye eat,
But ye have not enough;
Ye drink,
But ye are not filled with drink;
Ye clothe you,
But there is none warm;
And he that earneth wages
Earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes.
7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Consider your ways.
8 Go up to the mountain, and bring wood,
And build the house;
And I will take pleasure in it,
And I will be glorified, saith the LORD.
9 Ye looked for much, and, lo, it came to little;
And when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it.
Why? saith the LORD of hosts.
Because of mine house that is waste,
And ye run every man unto his own house.
10 Therefore the heaven over you is stayed from dew,
And the earth is stayed from her fruit.
11 And I called for a drought
Upon the land, and upon the mountains, [the oil,
And upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon
And upon that which the ground bringeth forth,
And upon men, and upon cattle,
And upon all the labour of the hands.

It was the complaint of the Jews in Babylon that they "saw not their signs," and there was "no more any prophet," Ps. lxxiv. 9, which was a just judgment upon them for mocking and misusing the prophets. We read of no prophets they had in their return, as there were in their coming out of Egypt, Hos. xii. 13. God stirred them up immediately by his Spirit, to exert themselves in that escape, Ezr. i. 5, for though God makes use of prophets he needs them not, he can do his work without them. But the lamp of Old Testament prophecy shall yet make some bright and glorious efforts before it expire; and Haggai is the first that appears under the character of a spiritual messenger from heaven, when the word of the Lord had been long precious, as when prophecy began, 1 Sam. iii. 2, and there had been no open vision. In the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the third of the Persian kings, in the second year of his reign, this prophet was sent; and the word of the Lord came to him, and came by him, to the leading men among the Jews, who are here named, ver. 1. The chief governor, 1. Of the state; that was Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, of the house of David, who was commander-in-chief of the Jews, in their return out of captivity. 2. In the church; and that was Joshua the son of Josedech, who was now high priest. They were great men, and good men, and yet were to be stirred up to their duty when they grew amiss. What the people also were faulty in they must be told of, that they might use their power and interest for the mending of it. The prophets, who were extraordinary messengers, did not go about to set aside the ordinary institutions of magistracy and ministry, but endeavoured to render both more effectual for the ends to which they were appointed, for both ought to be supported. Now observe,

First. What the sin of the Jews was at this time, ver. 2. As soon as they came up out of captivity they set up an altar for sacrifice, and within a year after laid the foundations of a temple, Ezr. iii. 10. They then seemed very forward in it, and it was likely enough that the work would be done suddenly; but being served with a prohibition some time after from the Persian court, and charged not to go on with it, they not only yielded to the force when they were actually under it, which might be excused, but afterwards, when the violence of the opposition was abated, they continued very indifferent to it; had no spirit or courage to set about it again, but seemed glad they had a pretence to let it stand still. Though they who are employed for God may be driven off from their work by a storm, yet they must return to it as soon as the storm is over: these here did not do so, but continued loitering, until they were afresh minded of their duty. And that which they suggested one to another was, "The time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built;" that is,

1. Our time has not come for the doing of it, because we have not yet got up our backs after our captivity, our losses are not repaired, nor have we yet got beforehand in the world. It is too great an undertaking for new beginners in the world, as we are; let us first get our own houses up, before we talk of building churches; and in the mean time let a bare altar serve us, as it did our father Abraham. They did not say, they would not build a temple at all, but not yet; it is all in good time. Note, Many a good work is put by, by being put off; as Felix put off the prosecution of his convictions to a more convenient season. They do not say, they will never repent, and reform, and be religious, but not yet; and so the great business we were sent into the world to do is not done, under pretence it is all in good time to go about it.

2. God's time has not come for the doing of it; for, say they, the restraint laid upon us by authority in a legal way is not broken off, and therefore we ought not to proceed, though there be a present connivance of authority. Note, There is an aptness in us to misinterpret providential discouragements in our duty, as if they amounted to a discharge from our duty, when they are only intended for the trial and exercise of our courage and faith. It is bad to neglect our duty, but it is worse to vouch providence for the patronising of our neglects.

Secondly. What the judgments of God were by which they were punished for this neglect, ver. 6, 9—11. They neglected the building of God's house, and put that off, that they might have time and money for their secular affairs. They desired to be excused from such an expensive piece of work, under this pretence, that they must provide for their families; their children must have meat and portions too, and till they have got beforehand in the world they cannot think of rebuilding the temple. Now, that the punishment might answer the sin, God by his providence kept them still behindhand. And that poverty which they thought to prevent by not building the temple God brought upon them for not building it. They were sensible of the smart of the judgment, and every one complained of the unseasonable weather, and the great losses they sustained in their corn and cattle, and the decay of trade, but they were not sensible of the cause of the judgment, and the ground of God's controversy with them; they did not, or would not, see and own that it was for their putting off the building of the temple that they lay under these manifest tokens of God's displeasure; and therefore God here gives them notice that this was it for which he contended with them. Note, We need the help of God's prophets and ministers to expound to us not only the judgments of God's mouth, but the judgments of his hands, that we may understand his mind and meaning, in his rod as well as in his word, to discover to us not only wherein we have offended God, but wherein God shews himself offended at us. Let us observe,

1. How God contended with them. He did not send them into captivity again, nor bring a foreign enemy upon them, as they deserved, but took the correcting of them into his own hands, for his mercies are great.

1st. He that giveth seed to the sower denied his blessing upon the seed sown, and then it never prospered; they had nothing, or next to nothing, from it. "They sowed much," ver. 6, kept a deal of ground in tillage, which they might expect would turn to a better advantage than usual, because their land had long lain fallow, and had enjoyed its sabbath. Having sowed much, they looked for much from it, enough to spend, and enough to spare too, but were disappointed; they bring in little, very little, ver. 6. However, when they have made the utmost of it, it comes to little, ver. 9, it did not yield as they expected; Isa. v. 10, "The seed of an homer shall yield an ephah," a bushel's sowing shall yield a peck. Note, Our expectations from the creature are oftentimes most frustrated when they are most raised; and then, when we look for much, it comes to little, that our expectation may be from God only, in whom it will be outdone. We are here told how they came to be disappointed; ver. 10, "The heaven over you is stayed from dew." He that has the key of the clouds in his hands shut them up, and withheld the rain when the ground called for it, the former or the latter rain, and then of course "the earth is stayed from her fruit;" for if the heaven be as brass the land is as iron. The corn perhaps came up very well, and promised a very plentiful crop, but for want of the dews at bearing time it never filled, but was parched with the heat of the sun, and so withered away. The restored captives, that had long been kept bare in Babylon, thought they should never want when they had got their own land in possession again, and had that at command; but what the better are they for it, unless they had the clouds at command too? God will make us sensible of our necessary and constant dependence upon him, throughout all the links in the chain of second causes, from first to last; so that we can at no time say, Now we have no farther occasion for God and his providence: see Hos. ii. 21. But God not only withheld the cooling rains, but he appointed the scorching heats; ver. 11, "I called for a drought upon the land," ordered the weather to be extremely hot, and then the fruits of the earth were burnt up. See how every creature is that to us that God makes it to be, either comfortable or afflictive, serving us or incommoding us. Nothing among the inferior creatures is so necessary and beneficial to the world as the heat of the sun,—that is it that puts life into the plants, and renews the face of the earth at spring; and yet, if that goes into an extreme, it undoes all again. Our Creator is our best friend, but, if we make him our enemy, we make the best friends we have among the creatures our enemies too. This drought God calls for, and it came at the call; as the winds and the waves, so the rays of the sun obey him. It was universal, and the ill effects of it general; it was a drought upon the mountains, which, lying high, were first affected with it. The mountains were their pasture grounds, and used to be covered over with flocks, but now there is no grass for them. It was upon the corn, the new wine, and the oil; all failed through the extremity of the hot weather, even all that the ground brought forth; it was all withered. Nay, it had an ill influence upon men; the hot weather enfeebled some, and made them weary and faint, and spent their spirits; it inflamed others, and put them into fevers. It should seem it brought diseases upon cattle too. In short, it spoiled all the labour of their hands, which they hoped to eat of, and maintain their families by. Note, Meat for the belly is meat that perisheth, and, if we labour for that only, we are in danger of losing our labour; but are sure our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord, if we labour for meat that endures to eternal life; for the hand of the diligent, in the business of religion, will infallibly make rich; whereas, in the business of this life, the most solicitous, and the most industrious, often lose the labour of their hands. "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong."

2nd. He that giveth bread to the eater denied his blessing upon the bread they eat, and then that did not nourish them. The cause of the withering and failing of the corn in the field was visible; it was for want of rain. But, besides that, there was a secret blast and curse attending that which they brought home. First. When they had it in the barn they were not sure of it. "I did blow upon it, saith the Lord of hosts," ver. 9, and that withered it; as buds are sometimes blasted in the spring by a nipping frost, which we see the effects of, but know not the way of. 'I did blow it away,' so the margin reads it. When men have heaped wealth together God can scatter it with the breath of his mouth as easily as we can blow away a feather. Note, We can never be sure of any thing in this world; it is exposed not only when it is in the field, but when it is housed, for there moth and rust corrupt, Mat. vi. 19. And if we would have the comfort and continuance of our temporal enjoyments, we must make God our friend; for if he bless them to us they are blessings indeed, but if he blow upon them we can expect no good from them,—they "make themselves wings and fly away." Secondly. When they had it upon the board, it was not that to them that they expected; "Ye eat, but ye have not enough;" either because the meat is washy and not satisfying, or because the stomach is greedy and not satisfied. You eat, but you have no good digestion, and so are not nourished by it, nor doth it answer the end; or, you have not enough, because you are not content, nor think it enough. "Ye drink," but are not cooled and refreshed by it, "you are not filled with drink;" you are stinted, and have not enough to quench your thirst, the "new wine is cut off from your mouths," Joel i. 5. Nay, and you drink your water too by measure, and with astonishment; you have no comfort of it, because you have no plenty of it, but are still in fear of falling short. Thirdly. That which they had upon their backs did them no good there; "Ye clothe you, but there is none warm;" your clothes soon wear out, and wax old, and grow thin, because God blows upon them, contrary to what Israel's did in the wilderness, when God blessed them. It is God that makes our garments warm upon us, when he quieteth the earth, Job xxxvii. 17. Fourthly. That which they had in their bags, which was not laid out, but laid up, yet they were not sure of it. He that earns wages by hard labour, and has it paid him in ready current money, yet "puts it into a bag with holes," it drops through and wastes away insensibly. Every thing is so scarce and dear that they spend their money as fast as they get it. Those that lay up their treasure on earth put it into a bag with holes, they lose it as they go along, and they that come after them pick it up. But if we lay up our treasure in heaven, we provide for ourselves "bags that wax not old," Lu. xii. 33.

2. Observe wherefore God thus contended with them, and stopped the current of those favours promised them at their return, Joel ii. 24. They provoked him to do it; "It is because of my house that is waste." That is the quarrel God has with them. The foundation of the temple is laid, but the building doth not go on; every man runs to his own house, to finish that, and to make that convenient and fine, and no care is taken about the Lord's house; and therefore it is that God crosseth you thus in all your affairs, to testify his displeasure against you for that neglect, and to bring you to a sense of your sin and folly. Note, As those that "seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness" thereof, shall not only find them, but are most likely to have other things added to them, so they who neglect and postpone those things, will not only lose them, but will justly have other things taken away from them. And if God cross us in our temporal affairs, and we meet trouble and disappointment, we shall find this is the cause of it; the work we have to do for God and our own souls is left undone, and we "seek our own things more than the things of Jesus Christ," Phil. ii. 21.

Thirdly. The reproof which the prophet gives them for their neglect of the temple work. "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses," to have them beautified and adorned, and your families settled in them? They were not content with walls and roofs for necessity, but they must have for gaiety and fancy. It is high time, saith one, that my house were wainscotted; and high time, saith another, that mine were painted; and God's house all this while lies waste, and nothing is done at it. What! saith the prophet, Is it time you should have your humour pleased, and not time you should have your God pleased? How was their disposition the reverse of David's, who could not be easy in his house of cedar while the ark of God was in curtains, 2 Sam. vii. 2; and of Solomon, who built the temple of God before he built a palace for himself. Note, Those are very much strangers to their own interest that prefer the conveniences and ornaments of the temporal life before the absolute necessities of the spiritual life; that are full of care to enrich their own houses, while God's temple in their hearts lies waste, and nothing is done for it, or in it.

Fourthly. The good counsel which the prophet gives to them who thus despised God, and whom God was therefore justly displeased with.

1. He would have them reflect. "Now therefore consider your ways," ver. 5, and again, ver. 7. Be sensible of the hand of God gone out against you, and inquire into the reason. Think what you have done that has provoked God thus to break in upon your comforts; and think what you will do to testify your repentance, that God may return in mercy to you. Note, It is the great concern of every one of us to consider our ways; 'to set our hearts to our ways,' so the word is; to "think on our ways," Ps. cxix. 59, to search and try them, Lam. iii. 40, to "ponder the path of our feet," Pr. iv. 26, to apply our minds with all seriousness to the great and necessary duty of self-examination, and communing with our own hearts concerning our spiritual state, our sins that are past, and our duty for the future; for sin is what we must answer for, duty is what we must do; about these, therefore, we must be inquisitive, rather than about events, which we must leave to God. Many are quicksighted to pry into other people's ways that are very careless of their own; whereas our concern is to "prove every one his own work," Gal. vi. 4.

2. He would have them reform; ver. 8, "Go up to the mountain," to Lebanon, "and bring wood," and other materials, that are wanting, "and build the house" with all speed,—put it off no longer, but set to it in good earnest. Note, Our considering of our ways must issue in the amending of whatever we find amiss in them. If any duty has been long neglected, that is not a reason why it should still be so, but why now at length it should be revived; better late than never. And for their encouragement to apply themselves in good earnest to this work, he assures them, 1st. That they should be accepted of him in it. "Build the house, and I will take pleasure in it;" and that was encouragement enough to apply themselves to it with alacrity and resolution, and to go through with it, whatever it cost them. Note, Whatever God will take pleasure in when it is done, we ought to take pleasure in the doing of, and to reckon that inducement enough to set about it, and go on with it, in good earnest; for what greater satisfaction can we have in our own bosoms than in contributing any thing towards that which God will take pleasure in? It ought to have been the top of their ambition to be accepted of the Lord, 2 Cor. v. 9. Though they had foolishly neglected the house of God, yet if at length they will resume the care of it, God will not remember against them their former neglects, but will take pleasure in the work of their hands. Those that have long deferred their return to God, if at length they return with all their heart, must not despair of his favour. 2nd. That he would be honoured by them in it; "I will be glorified, saith the Lord." He will be served and worshipped in the temple, when it is built, and sanctified in them that come nigh to him. It is worth while to bestow all possible care, and pains, and cost upon that by which God may be glorified.

12 Then Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, with all the remnant of the people, obeyed the voice of the LORD their God, and the words of Haggai the prophet, as the LORD their God had sent him, and the people did fear before the LORD. 13 Then spake Haggai the LORD's messenger in the LORD's message unto the people, saying, I am with you, saith the LORD. 14 And the LORD stirred up the spirit of Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and the spirit of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, and the spirit of all the remnant of the people; and they came and did work in the house of the LORD of hosts, their God, 15 In the four and twentieth day of the sixth month, in the second year of Darius the king.

"As an earring of gold," (saith Solomon,) and "an ornament of fine gold," so amiable, so acceptable, in the sight of God and man, "is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear," Pr. xxv. 12. The prophet here was a wise, but faithful, reprover in God's name, and he met with an obedient ear. The foregoing sermon met with the desired success among the people, and that met with due encouragement from God. Observe,

First. How the people returned to God in the way of duty. All those to whom that sermon was preached received the word in the love of it, and were wrought upon by it. Zerubbabel, the chief governor, did not think himself above the check and command of God's word. He was a man that had been eminently useful in his day, and serviceable to the interest of the church, yet did not plead his former merits in answer to this reproof for his present remissness, but submitted to it. Joshua's business, as high priest, was to teach, and yet he was willing himself to be taught, and willingly received admonition and instruction. The "remnant of the people,"—and the whole body of them was but a remnant, a very few of the many thousands of Israel,—also were very pliable; they all "obeyed the voice of the Lord their God," and bowed their neck to the yoke of his commands; and it is here recorded to their honour, ver. 12. Their Father said, "Sons, go work to-day in my vineyard," in my temple; and they not only say, We go, sir, but they went immediately.

1. They looked upon the prophet to be "the Lord's messenger," and the word he delivered to be the Lord's message to them; and therefore received it, not as the word of man, but as the word of Almighty God. They obeyed his words, "as the Lord their God had sent him," ver. 12. Note, In attending to God's ministers we must have an eye to him that sent them, and receive them for his sake, while they act according to their commission.

2. They did "fear before the Lord." Prophecy was a new thing with them; they had had no special messenger from heaven for a great while, and therefore now they had one, and but one, they paid an extraordinary regard to him; whereas their fathers, that had many prophets, mocked and misused them. It is sometimes so, when good preaching is most scarce it does most good; whereas the manna that is rained in plenty is loathed as light bread. And, because they so readily received this prophet, within a month or two God raised them up another, Zec. i. 1. They "feared before the Lord," that is, they had a great regard to the Divine authority, and a great dread of the Divine wrath, and were of those that "trembled at God's word." The judgments of God they had been under, though severe, had not prevailed to make them fear before the Lord, till the word of God was sent to expound his providences, and then they feared,—then, when they saw their own sin the cause of those judgments, then they feared. Note, A holy fear of God will have a great influence upon our obedience to him. "Serve the Lord with fear;" if we fear him not, we shall not serve him.

3. "The Lord stirred up their spirits," ver. 14. 1st. He excited them to their duty, and put it into their hearts to go about it. Note, Then the word of God has its success when God by his grace stirs up our spirits to comply with it; and without that grace we should remain stupid, and utterly averse to every thing that is good. It is in the day of a Divine power that we are made willing. 2nd. He encouraged them in their duty, and with those encouragements enlarged their hearts, Ps. cxix. 32. When they heard the word they feared; but, lest they should sink under the weight of that fear, God stirred them up, and made them cheerful and bold, to encounter the difficulties they might meet with. Note, When God has work to do he will either find or make men fit to do it, and stir them up to it.

4. They applied themselves to their work with all possible vigour; "They came and did work in the house of the Lord of hosts, their God." Every one, according as his capacity or ability was, lent a hand, some way or other, to further that good work; and this they did with an eye to God, as the Lord of hosts, and as their God, the God of Israel. The consideration of God's sovereign dominion in the world by his providence, and his covenant relation to his people by his grace, should stir up our spirits to act for him, and for the advancement of the interest of his kingdom among men to the utmost of our power.

5. They did this speedily. It was but on the first day of the sixth month that Haggai preached them this sermon, and by the twenty-fourth of the same month, little more than three weeks after, they were all busy, working in the "house of the Lord their God," ver. 15. To shew that they were ashamed of their delays hitherto, now they were convinced and called, they were resolved to delay no longer, but strike while the iron was hot, and set about the work while they were under convictions. Note, Those that have lost time have need to redeem time, and the longer we have loitered in that which is good, when we are convinced of our folly the more haste we should make.

Secondly. How God met them in a way of mercy. The same prophet that brought them the reproof brought them a very comforting, encouraging word; "Then spake Haggai the Lord's messenger in the Lord's message," (in his name, and as from him,) "saying, I am with you, saith the Lord." That is all he has to say, and that is enough; as that word of Christ to his disciples is, Mat. xxviii. 20, "Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world." "I am with you," that is, I will forgive your neglects hitherto, and they shall not be remembered against you; I will remove the judgments you have been under for those neglects, and will appear for you, as I have in them appeared against you. "I am with you," to protect you against your enemies, that bear ill-will to your work, and to prosper you, and to give you success in it; with you, to strengthen your hands, and bless the work of them, without which blessing they labour in vain that build. Note, Those that work for God have God with them; and if he be for us who can be against us? If he be with us what difficulty can stand before us?

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have three sermons preached by the prophet Haggai, for the encouragement of those that are forward to build the temple. In the first he assures the builders that the glory of this house they were now building should in spiritual respects, though not in outward, exceed that of Solomon's temple, in which he has an eye to the coming of Christ, ver. 1—9. In the second he assures them, that though their sin in delaying to build the temple had retarded the prosperous progress of all their other affairs, yet, now they had set about it in good earnest, he would bless them, and give them success, ver. 10—19. In the third he assures Zerubbabel that, as a reward of his pious zeal and activity herein, he should be a favourite of heaven, and one of the ancestors of Messiah the Prince, whose kingdom should be set up on the ruins of all opposing powers, ver. 20—23.

IN the seventh month, in the one and twentieth day of the month, came the word of the LORD by the prophet Haggai, saying, 2 Speak now to Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, and to the residue of the people, saying,

3 Who is left among you
That saw this house in her first glory?
And how do ye see it now?
Is it not in your eyes in comparison of it as nothing?
4 Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the LORD;
And be strong, O Joshua, son of Josedech, the high priest; [and work:
And be strong, all ye people of the land, saith the LORD,
For I am with you, saith the LORD of hosts:
5 According to the word that I covenanted with you
When ye came out of Egypt,
So my spirit remaineth among you:
Fear ye not.
6 For thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Yet once, it is a little while,

SUPPOSED FORM OF FIRST TEMPLE.—ver. 9.

And I will shake the heavens, and the earth,
And the sea, and the dry land;
7 And I will shake all nations,
And the desire of all nations shall come:
And I will fill this house with glory, saith the LORD of 8 The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, [hosts.
Saith the LORD of hosts.
9 The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of Saith the LORD of hosts: [the former,
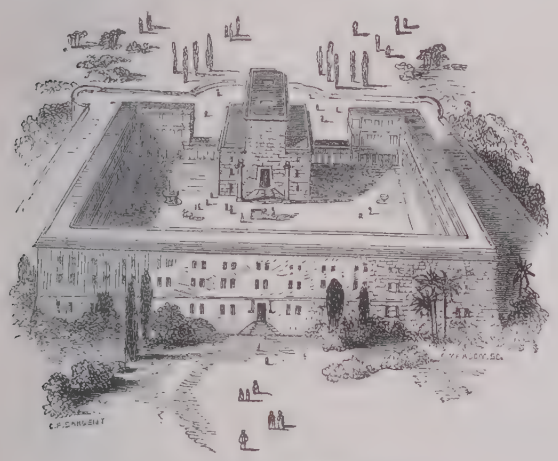
And in this place will I give peace,
Saith the LORD of hosts.



SUPPOSED FORM OF SECOND TEMPLE.

Here is, First. The date of this message, ver. 1. It was sent on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, when the builders had been about a month at work, (since the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month,) and had got it in some forwardness. Note, Those that are hearty in the service of God shall receive fresh encouragements from him to proceed in it, as their case calls for them. Set the wheels a going, and God will oil them.

Secondly. The direction of this message, ver. 9. The encouragements here are sent to the same persons to whom the reproofs in the foregoing chapter are directed; for they that are wounded by the convictions of the word shall be healed and bound up by its consolations. Speak to Zerubbabel and Joshua, and the "residue of the people," the very same that "obeyed the voice of the Lord," ch. i. 12, and whose spirits God stirred up to do so, ch. i. 14; to them are sent these words of comfort.

Thirdly. The message itself. In which observe,

1. The discouragements which they laboured under that were employed in this work. That which was such a damp upon them, and an alloy to their joy, when the foundation of the temple was laid, was still a clog upon them, that they could not build such a temple now as Solomon built; not so large, so stately, so sumptuous a one as that was. This fetched tears from the eyes of many, when the dimensions of it were first laid, Ezr. iii. 12, and still it made the work go on heavily, that the glory of this house, in comparison with that of the former, was as nothing, ver. 3. It was now about seventy years since Solomon's temple was destroyed, (for that was in the nineteenth year of the captivity, and this about the nineteenth after the captivity,) so that there might be some yet alive that could remember to have seen it, and still they would be upbraiding themselves and their brethren with the great disparity between this house and that. One could remember the gold with which it was overlaid; another, the precious stones with which it was garnished. One could describe the magnificence of the porch, another of the pillars; and where are these now? This weakened the hands of the builders; for though our gracious God is pleased with us, if we do in sincerity as well as we can in his service, yet our proud heart will scarce let us be pleased with ourselves, unless we do as well as others whose abilities far exceed ours. And it is sometimes the fault of old people to discourage the services of the present age, by crying up too much the performances and attainments of the former age, with which others should be provoked to emulation, but not exposed to contempt; "Say not thou that the former days were better than these," Eccl. vii. 10, but thank God that there is any good in these, as bad as they are.

2. The encouragement that is given them to go on in the work notwithstanding; ver. 4, Yet now, though this house is likely to be much inferior to the former, yet "be strong, O Zerubbabel, and be strong, O Joshua;" let not these leading men give way to this suggestion, or be disheartened by it, but do as well as they can, when they cannot do so well as they would; and let all the people of the land be strong too, and work; and if the leaders have but a good heart on it, it is hoped the followers will have the better heart. Note, Those that work for God ought to exert themselves with vigour, and then to encourage themselves with hope that it will end well.

3. The grounds of these encouragements. God himself saith to them, "Fear ye not," ver. 5; and gives good reasons for it.

1st. They have God with them, his Spirit and his special presence, "Be strong, for I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts," ver. 4. This he had said before, ch. i. 13, "I am with you." But we need to have those assurances repeated, that we may have strong consolation. The presence of God with us, as the Lord of hosts, is enough to silence all our fears, and to help us over all the discouragement we may meet with in the way of our duty. The Jews had hosts against them, but they had the Lord of hosts with them to take their part, and plead their cause. He is with them; for, First. He adheres to his promise; his covenant is inviolable; and he will be always theirs, and will appear and act for them, "according to the word that he covenanted with them when they came out of Egypt." Though he "chasteneth their transgressions with the rod," yet he will not make his faithfulness to fail. Secondly. He dwells among them by his Spirit, the Spirit of prophecy. When he first formed them into a people "he gave his good Spirit to instruct them," Neh. ix. 20; and still the Spirit, though often grieved and provoked to withdraw, remained among them. It was the Spirit of God that stirred up their spirits to come out of Babylon, Ezr. i. 5, and now to build the temple, Hag. i. 14. Note, We have reason to be encouraged as long as we have the Spirit of God remaining among us to work upon us, for so long we have God with us to work for us.

2nd. They shall have the Messiah among them shortly; he that should come. To him bear all the prophets witness, and this prophet particularly here, ver. 6, 7. Here is an intimation of the time of his coming, that it would not be long ere he came: "Yet once, it is a little while," and he shall come. The Old Testament church has but one stage more (if we may so say) to travel; five stages were now past, from Adam to Noah, thence to Abraham, thence to Moses, thence to Solomon's temple, thence to the captivity, and now yet one stage more; it is six days' journey, and then comes the sabbatism of the Messiah's kingdom. Let the Son of man when he comes find faith on the earth, and let the children of promise continue still looking for him, for now it is but a little while and he will come. Hold out, faith and patience, yet a while, for "he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." And, as he then said of his first appearance, so now of his second, "Surely, I come quickly." Now concerning his coming it is here foretold, First. That it shall be introduced by a general shaking; ver. 6, "I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land." This is applied to the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world, to make way for which he will judge among the heathen, Ps. cx. 6. God will once again do for his church as he did when he brought them out of Egypt; then he shook the heavens and earth at mount Sinai, with the thunder, and lightnings, and earthquakes; shook the sea and the dry land, when lanes were made through the sea, and streams fetched out of the rock. This shall be done again, when at the sufferings of Christ the sun shall be darkened, the earth shake, and the rocks rent; when, at the birth of Christ, Herod and all Jerusalem are troubled, Mat. ii. 3, and he is set for the fall and rising again of many. When his kingdom was set up it was with a shock to the nations; the oracles were silenced, idols were destroyed, and the powers of the kingdoms were moved and removed, Heb. xii. 27. It speaks the removing of the things that are shaken. Note, The shaking of the nations is often in order to the settling of the church, and the establishing of the things that cannot be shaken. Secondly. That it shall issue in a general satisfaction. He shall come as "the desire of all nations," desirable to all nations, for in him shall all the families of the earth be blessed, with the best of blessings, that had been long expected and desired by the good people in all nations, that had any intelligence from the Old Testament predictions concerning him. Balaam, in the land of Moab, had spoken of a star that should arise out of Jacob; and Job, in the land of Uz, of his living Redeemer; the concourse of devout men from all parts at Jerusalem, Acts ii. 5, was in expectation of the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom about that time. All the nations that are brought in to Christ, and discipled in his name, have called him, and will call him, all their salvation and all their desire. This glorious title of Christ seems to refer to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10, that to him shall the gathering of the people be. Thirdly. The house they were now building shall be filled with glory to such a degree that its glory shall exceed that of Solomon's temple. The enemies of the Jews followed them with reproach, and cast contempt upon the house they were building; but they might very well endure that, when God undertook to fill it with glory. It is God's prerogative to fill with glory; the glory that comes from him is satisfying, and not vain glory. Moses' tabernacle and Solomon's temple were filled with glory, when God in a cloud took possession of them; but this house shall be filled with glory of another nature.

1*st.* Let them not be concerned that this house had not so much silver and gold about it as Solomon's temple had, ver. 8. God needs not the silver and gold to adorn his temple; for (saith he) "The silver is mine and the gold mine;" all the silver and gold in the world is his, all that is hid in the bowels of the earth, "for the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." All that is laid up in the exchequers, banks, and treasures of the children of men, and all that circulates for the maintaining of trade and commerce, it is all the Lord's. Every penny bears his image as well as Cæsar's. And, therefore, when gold and silver are dedicated to his honour, and employed in his service, no addition is made to him, for it was his before. When David and his princes offered vast sums for the service of the house of God, they acknowledge, "It is all thine own, and of thine own, Lord, have we given thee," 1 Chr. xxix. 14, 16. Therefore God needs not sacrifice, for every beast of the forest is his, Ps. l. 10. Note, If we have silver and gold, we must serve and honour God with it, for it is all his own, we have but the use of it, the property remains in him; but if we have not silver and gold to honour God with we must honour him with such as we have, and he will accept us, for he needs it not; all the silver and gold in the world is his already. "The earth is full of his riches," so is the great and wide sea also.

2*nd.* Let them be comforted with this, that, though this temple had less gold in it, it should have more glory than Solomon's; ver. 9, "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former." This was never true in respect of outward glory; this latter house was indeed in its latter times very much beautified and enriched by Herod, and we find the disciples admiring the stones and buildings of the temple, how fine they were, Mar. xiii. 1; but it was nothing in comparison with Solomon's temple; and besides, the Jews own that there were several of the Divine glories of the first temple that were wanting in this,—the ark, the Urim and Thummim, the fire from heaven, and the Shechinah, so that we cannot conceive how the glory of this latter house should in any thing exceed that of the former, but in that which would indeed excel all the glories of the first house, the presence of the Messiah in it, the Son of God, his being presented there, "the glory of his people Israel," his attending there at twelve years old, and afterwards his preaching and working miracles there, and his driving the buyers and sellers out of it. It was necessary then that the Messiah should come while that second temple stood, but that being long since destroyed, we must conclude that our Lord Jesus is the Christ, is he that should come, and we are to look for no other. It was also the "glory of this latter house," (1.) That before the coming of Christ it was always kept free from idols and idolatries, and was never polluted with those abominable things, as the first temple often was, 2 Kin. xxiii. 11, 12; and in this its glory excelled all the glory of that. Note, The purity of the church, and the strict adherence to Divine institutions, is much more its glory than external pomp and splendour. (2.) That after Christ the Gospel was preached in it by the apostles, even all the words of this life, Acts v. 20. In the temple Jesus Christ was daily preached, Acts v. 42. Now the ministration of righteousness and life by the Gospel was unspeakably more glorious than the law, which was a ministration of death and condemnation, 2 Cor. iii. 9, 10. Note, That is the most valuable glory which ariseth from our relation to Christ, and our interest in him. As, where Christ is, "behold, a greater than Solomon is there," so the heart in which he dwells, and makes a living temple, behold, it is more glorious than Solomon's temple, and will be so to eternity.

3rd. They should see a comfortable end of their present troubles, and enjoy the pleasure of a happy settlement. "In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts." Note, God's presence with his people in his ordinances secures to them all good. If God be with us, peace is with us. But the Jews under the latter temple had so much trouble, that we must conclude this promise to have its accomplishment in that spiritual peace which Jesus Christ has by his blood purchased for, and by his last will and testament bequeathed to, all believers, Jno. xiv. 27; that peace which Christ himself preached as the Prophet of peace, and gives as the Prince of peace. God will give peace in this place, that is, he will give his Son to be the peace, Eph. ii. 14.

10 In the four and twentieth day of the ninth month, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet, saying, 11 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Ask now the priests concerning the law, saying, 12 If one bear holy flesh in the skirt of his garment, and with his skirt do touch bread, or pottage, or wine, or oil, or any meat, shall it be holy? And the priests answered and said, No. 13 Then said Haggai, If one that is unclean by a dead body touch any of these, shall it be unclean? And the priests answered and said, It shall be unclean. 14 Then answered Haggai, and said,

So is this people, and so is this nation before me, saith [the LORD;
And so is every work of their hands;
And that which they offer there is unclean.

15 And now, I pray you, consider
From this day and upward,
From before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the LORD:

16 Since those days were,
When one came to an heap of twenty measures,
There were but ten:
When one came to the pressfat for to draw out fifty vessels out of the press,
There were but twenty.

17 I smote you with blasting and with mildew
And with hail in all the labours of your hands;
Yet ye turned not to me, saith the LORD.

18 Consider now from this day and upward,
From the four and twentieth day of the ninth month,
Even from the day that the foundation of the LORD's temple was laid,
Consider it.

19 Is the seed yet in the barn?
Yea, as yet the vine, and the fig tree,
And the pomegranate, and the olive tree, hath not [brought forth:
From this day will I bless you.

This sermon was preached two months after that in the former part of the chapter. The priests and Levites preached constantly, but the prophets preached occasionally; both were good and needful: we have need to be taught our duty in season and out of season. The people were now going on vigorously with the building of the temple, and in hopes shortly to have it ready for their use, and to be employed in the services of it; and now God sends them a message by his prophet which would be of use to them,

First. By way of conviction and caution. They were now engaged in a very good work, but they are concerned to see to it, not only that it be good for the matter of it, but that it be done in a right manner, for otherwise it would not be accepted of God. God sees there are many among them that spoil this good work, by going about it with unsanctified hearts and hands, and are likely to gain no advantage to themselves by it; these are here convicted, and all are warned thereby to purify the hands they employ in this work, for "to the pure only all things are pure," and from the pure only that comes which is pure. This matter is here illustrated by the established rules of the ceremonial law, in putting a difference between the clean and unclean, about which many of the appointments of the law were conversant. Hereby it appears that a spiritual use is to be made of the ceremonial law, and that it was intended not only as a Divine ritual to the Jews, but for instruction in righteousness to all, even to us, upon whom the ends of the world are come, to discover to us both sin and Christ, both our disease and our remedy. Now observe here,

1. What the rule of the law was. The prophet is ordered to inquire of the priests concerning it, ver. 11; for their lips should keep this knowledge, and the people should "inquire the law at their mouth," Mal. ii. 7. Haggai himself, though a prophet, must ask the priest concerning the law. His business, as an extraordinary messenger, was to expound the providences of God, and to give directions concerning particular duties, as he had done, ch. i. 8, 9. But he would not take the priests' work out of their hands who were the ordinary ministers, and whose business it was to expound the ordinances of God, and to teach the people the meaning of them, and to give the general rules for the observance of them. In a case of that nature, Haggai himself must consult them. Note, God has given to his ministers diversities of gifts, and calls them out to do diversities of services, so that they have need one of another, should make use one of another, and be helpful to one another. The prophet, though Divinely inspired, cannot say to the priest, I have no need of thee, nor can the priest say so to the prophet. Perhaps Haggai was therefore ordered to consult the priests, that out of their own mouths he might judge both them and the people committed to their charge, and convict them of worse than a ceremonial pollution: see Lev. x. 10, 11. Now the rules of the law, in the cases propounded, are,

1st. That he that has holy flesh in his clothes cannot, by the touch of his clothes, communicate holiness; ver. 12, "If one bear holy flesh in the skirt of his garment," though the garment is thereby so far made a devoted thing as that it is not to be put to common use till it has first been washed in the holy place, Lev. vi. 27, yet it shall by no means transmit a holiness to either meat or drink, so as to make them ever the better to those that use them.

2nd. That he that is ceremonially unclean by the touch of a dead body doth by his touch communicate that uncleanness. The law is express, Num. xix. 22, "Whatsoever the unclean person toucheth shall be unclean," yet this Haggai will have from the priests' own mouth; for concerning those things that we find very plain in our Bibles yet it is good to have the advice of our ministers. The sum of these two rules is, that pollution is easier communicated than sanctification; that is, saith Grotius, there are many ways of vice, but only one of virtue, and that a difficult one. Bonum oritur ex integris, malum ex quolibet defectu,—'Good implies perfection, evil commences with the slightest defect.' Let not men think that living among good people will recommend them to God if they be not good themselves, but let them fear that touching the unclean thing will defile them, and therefore let them keep at a distance from it.

2. How it is here applied; ver. 14, "So is this people, and so is this nation before me." He doth not call them his people and his nation, they are unworthy to be owned by him, but this people, and this nation; they have been thus before God. They thought their offering sacrifices on the altar would sanctify them, and excuse their neglect to build the temple, and remove the curse which by that neglect they had brought upon their common enjoyments. No, saith God, your holy flesh and your altar will be so far from sanctifying your meat and drink, your wine and oil, to you, that your contempt of God's temple will bring a pollution, not only on your common enjoyments, but even on your sacrifices too; so that, while you continued in that neglect, all was unclean to you; nay, and so is this people still, and so they will be. On these terms they will stand with me, and on no other,—that if they be profane, and sensual, and morally impure, if they have wicked hearts, and live wicked lives, though they work never so hard at the temple while it is building, and though they offer never so many and costly sacrifices there when it is built, yet that shall not serve to sanctify their meat and drink to them, and to give them a comfortable use of it; nay, the impurity of their hearts and lives shall make even that work of their hands and all their offerings unclean, and an abomination to God. And the case is the same with us. Those whose devotions are plausible, but their conversations wicked, will find their devotions unable to sanctify their enjoyments, but their wickedness prevailing to pollute them. Note, When we are employed in any good work we should be jealous over ourselves, lest we render it unclean by our corruptions and mismanagements.

Secondly. By way of comfort and encouragement. If their hearts be right with God, and their eye single in his service, they shall have the benefit of it. God will take away the judgment of famine wherewith they have been corrected for their remissness, and will restore them great plenty. This they are called to consider and observe, whether God would not be to the utmost as good as his word, and by his providence remarkably countenance and recompense their reformation in this matter. To make this the more signal, let them set down the day when they began to work at the building of the temple, to raise the structure upon the foundations that had been laid some time before. On the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month they began to prepare materials, ch. i. 5; and now on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month they began to "lay a stone upon a stone in the temple of the Lord." Let them take notice of this day, and observe,

1. How they were gone behindhand in their estates before this day. Let them remember the time when there was a sensible waste and decay in all they had, ver. 16. A man came to his garner, expecting to find a heap of twenty measures of corn, so much he used to have from such a piece of ground, or so much used to be left at that time of the year, or so much he took it for granted there was when he fetched the last from it, but he found it unaccountably diminished, and when he came to measure it there were but ten measures; it was run in, and dried away in the keeping; or vermin had eaten it, or it was stolen. In like manner he went to the winepress, expecting to draw fifty vessels of wine, for so much he used to have from such a quantity of grapes, but they did not yield as usual, for he could get but twenty. This agrees with what we had ch. i. 1, "Ye looked for much, and it came to little." Note, It is our folly that we are apt to raise our expectations from the creature, and to think to-morrow must needs be as this day, and much more abundant, but we are commonly disappointed; and the more we expect the more grievous the disappointment is. In the stores and treasures of the new covenant we need not fear being disappointed, when we come by faith to draw from them. But this was not all; God did visibly contend with them in the weather; ver. 17, "I smote you with blasting," winds and frosts, which made every green thing to wither; "and with mildew," which choked the corn when it was knitting; "and with hail," which battered it down and broke it when it was grown to some maturity. Thus they were baulked in all the labour of their hands, while they neglected to lay their hand to the work of God, and to labour in that. Note, While we take no care of God's interest we cannot expect he should take care of ours; and when he thus walks contrary to us, he expects that we should return to him, and to our duty. But this people either saw not the hand of God in it, imputing it to chance, or saw not their own sin, the provoking cause of it, and therefore turned not to him. They were a long time incorrigible and unhumbled under these rebukes, so that God's hand was "stretched out still, for the people turned not to him that smote them," Isa. ix. 12, 13. They might easily observe that as long as they continued in the neglect of the temple work all their affairs went backward. But,

2. Let them now observe, and they should find that from this day forward God would bless them, ver. 18, 19. Consider now whether, when you begin to change your way towards God, you do not find God changing his way towards you. From this day, when you fall to work about the temple, consider it, I say, and you shall find a remarkable turn given for the better to all your affairs. "Is the seed yet in the barn?" Yes, it is, and not yet thrown into the ground. The fruit trees do not as yet bud, the vine, and the fig-tree, and the olive-tree have not as yet brought forth, so that nothing appears to promise a good harvest and vintage next year. Nature doth not promise it; but now you begin to apply yourselves in good earnest to your duty, the God of nature promiseth it; he has said, "From this day I will bless you." It is the best day's work you ever did in your lives, for from hence you may date the return of your prosperity. He doth not say what they shall be, but in general, "I will bless you;"

and those that know what are the fruits flowing from God's blessing know they can desire no more to make them happy. "I will bless you," and then you shall soon recover all your losses, shall thrive as fast as before you went backward, for "the blessing of the Lord, that maketh rich," and those whom he blesseth are blessed indeed. Note, When we begin to make conscience of our duty to God we may expect his blessing. And this tree of life is so known by its fruits, that one may discern, almost to a day, a remarkable turn of providence in favour of those that return in a way of duty, so that they and others may say, from this day they are blessed: see Mal. iii. 10. And "whoso is wise will observe these things, and understand" by them "the lovingkindness of the Lord."

20 And again the word of the LORD came unto Haggai in the four and twentieth day of the month, saying, 21 Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah, saying,
I will shake the heavens and the earth;
22 And I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms,
And I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen;
And I will overthrow the chariots, and those that ride in [them;
And the horses and their riders shall come down,
Every one by the sword of his brother.
23 In that day, saith the LORD of hosts,
Will I take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant,
The son of Shealtiel, saith the LORD,
And will make thee as a signet:
For I have chosen thee, saith the LORD of hosts.

After Haggai's sermon ad populum,—'to the people,' here follows one the same day, ad magistratum,—'to the magistrates,' a word directed particularly to Zerubbabel, the governor of Judah, who was a leading active man in this good work the people now set about, and therefore he shall have some particular marks put upon him; ver. 21, "Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah," speak to him by himself; he hath thoughts in his head far above those of the common people, as wise princes use to have, that move in a higher and larger sphere than others. The people of the land are in care about their corn-fields and vineyards, God has assured them that they shall prosper, and we hope that will make them easy; but Zerubbabel is concerned about the community and the interests of that, about the neighbour nations and the revolutions of their governments, and what will become of the few and feeble Jews in those changes and convulsions, and how such a poor prince as he is should be able to keep his ground and serve his country. Go to him, saith God, and tell him it shall be well with him and his remnant, and let that make him easy.

First. Let him expect to hear of great commotions in the nations of the earth, and let them not be a surprise to him. Behold, he is told of them before; ver. 21, 22, "I will shake the heavens and the earth." This he had said before, ver. 6, 7, and now saith it again to Zerubbabel. Let him expect shaking times, universal concussions. The world is like the sea, like the wheel, always in motion, but sometimes in a special manner turbulent. But, blessed be God, if the earth be shaken, it is to "shake the wicked out of it," Job xxxviii. 13. In the apocalyptic visions earthquakes bode no ill to the church. Here the heavens and the earth are shaken, that proud oppressors may be broken and brought down: "I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms." The Chaldean monarchy, that had been the throne of kingdoms a great while, was already overthrown, and the powers that are, and are yet to come, shall in like manner be overthrown; their day will come to fall. 1. Though they be never so powerful, the very strength of their kingdoms shall be destroyed. They "trust in chariots and horses," Ps. xx. 7; but their chariots shall be overthrown, and those that ride in them, so that they shall not be able to attack the people of God, whom they persecute, nor to escape the judgments of God, which persecute them. 2. Though there appear none likely to be the instruments of their destruction, yet God will bring it about, or they shall be brought down, "every one by the sword of his brother." This reads the doom of all the enemies of God's church, that will not repent to give him glory. It seems likewise designed as a promise of Christ's victory over the power of darknesss, his overthrow of Satan's throne, that throne of kingdoms, the throne of the god of this world, the taking from him all the armour wherein he trusted, and dividing the spoil. And all opposing "rule, principality, and power" shall be put down, that the kingdom may be "delivered up to God, even the Father."

Secondly. Let him depend upon it that he shall be safe under the Divine protection in the midst of all these commotions, ver. 23. Zerubbabel was active to build God a house, and therefore God makes the same promise to him as he did to David on the like occasion, that he would build him a house, and establish it, even in that day when heaven and earth are shaken. This promise refers to this good man himself, and to his family; he honoured God, and God would honour him. His successors likewise in the government of Judah might take encouragement from it; though their authority was very precarious as to men, yet God would confirm it, and this would contribute to the stability of the people over whom God had set them. But this promise hath special reference to Christ, who lineally descended from Zerubbabel, and is the sole builder of the Gospel temple. 1. Zerubbabel is here owned as God's servant, and it is an honourable mention that is hereby made of him, as Moses and David, "My servant." When God destroys his enemies, he will prefer his servants. Our Lord Jesus is his Father's servant in the work of redemption, but faithful as a Son, Isa. xlii. 1. 2. He is owned as God's elect. I have chosen thee into this office; and whom God makes choice of he will make use of. Our Lord Jesus is chosen of God, 1 Pet. ii. 4; and he is the head of the chosen remnant,—in him they are chosen. 3. It is promised that, being chosen, God will make him as a signet. Jeconiah had been as the "signet on God's right hand," but was plucked thence, Jer. xxii. 24; and now Zerubbabel is substituted in the room of him. He shall be near and dear to God, precious in his sight and honourable, and his family shall continue till the Messiah spring out of it, who is "the signet on God's right hand." This speaks, 1st. The delight the Father has in him; in him he once and again declared himself to be well pleased. He is set as a "seal upon his heart, a seal upon his arm," is brought near unto him, Dan. vii. 13; is "hid in the shadow of his hand," Isa. xlix. 2. 2nd. The dominion the Father has intrusted him with. Princes sign their edicts, grants, and commissions with their signet rings, Est. iii. 10. Our Lord Jesus is the signet on God's right hand, for all power is given to him, and derived from him. By him the great charter of the Gospel is signed and ratified, and it is in him that all the promises of God are Yea and Amen.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF HAGGAI.

CHAP. II.—7. The desire of all nations. Who this person should be, may easily be known by the application of the same, or synonymous epithets, in the other prophets. From Abraham's days a seed was promised, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, Gen. xxii. 18; xxvi. 4; xxviii. 14. The promise was renewed to Isaac, afterwards to Jacob, who restrained it to one of Judah's posterity, to Shiloh, who was foretold to be the gathering of the people; or, as the Hebrew is rendered by the Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, and Jarchi, the expectation or desire of the people. It appears from hence, from Isa. x., xii. 4, and other passages, that the expectation, the hope, the desire of all nations, and of Israel in particular, was a known description of some person, delivered from one prophet to another, and which after the captivity was applied and confined to the Messias: compare this passage with Mal. iii. 1. The quality of the person and the place do agree so exactly, that one must think the same person is meant by both prophets, who is no other than the Lord Messias, termed "The hope, the blessed hope of Israel, the hope of the promise to the twelve tribes, the blessing of Abraham to the Gentiles," 1 Tim. i. 1; Tit. ii. 13, &c. Accordingly, the Jews, about our Saviour's time, interpret this passage of the Messias. Akiba, who might be born under the second temple, and was chief rabbi and counsellor to Barchochba in Trajan's reign, understands it so, as likewise does the Targum on Isa. iv. 2. Not to search after more authorities, we may acquiesce in the confession of Jarchi, who asserts 'That the ancients expounded this place of the Messias.' The word peace (ver. 9) is likewise a name of the Messias; and, as it includes all kinds of happiness, seems to be the reason why he is the desire of all nations, even because he shall be the blessing of all nations. However, this is one among the other lofty titles of the Messiah in Isa. ix. 6, "Prince, peace;" as the words may be rendered in apposition. The Jews paraphrase "He shall be our peace," Mic. v. 2, 5, by "the Messias shall be our peace." And they likewise pray for him under that title in their liturgy, 'Cause to come to us blessing and peace quickly. Give peace, good, blessing to us and thy people Israel, &c.' Add to this, that the Messiah is spoken of in other places of Scripture by the name of glory of the Lord, and then nothing is wanting to prove that the person, whose coming shall make the latter house glorious, must be the Messiah. The texts hinted at are Isa. xl. 5, lx. 1, 2, according to the paraphrase of the Targum; the rabbinical book entitled Sanhedrim, xi. 36; and Kimchi. This interpretation is farther established and confirmed from the expectation that the Jews generally had of the Messiah's coming before the end of the second temple, into which the person prophesied of by Haggai was to come. To this purpose are several of their traditions: as in Midrasch on Deu. xxxiii. 12; Ber. Ketan. on Gen. i., pas. 2; Breschith Rabba on Gen. xxvii. 47, 'The second temple shall continue to the age to come, and the days of the Messias.' Talmud. Hieros. R. Berachoth, Jarchi, 'The day when the temple was destroyed the Messias was born.' And very remarkable is the exclamation of R. Jose, who lived at the destruction by Titus, and affected with the sight, cried, 'Alas! the time of the Messiah is passed.' They then never dreamed of a third temple, so strongly insisted upon by Abarbanel, much less did they infer it, as he has done from this very passage, whereas the prophet expressly asserts the direct contrary. Haggai's temple is plainly the same as they then saw, and which was in their eyes as nothing; for he adds for their comfort, "I will fill this house with glory, and the glory of this latter shall be greater than the former; I will fill this place with peace." There had been at that time but two houses; Solomon's, which was the former, was not; Zerubbabel's, which is the latter, was now building—unlike to the former in magnificence, and yet promised to exceed it in glory. Nothing can be plainer than that into this house the desire of all nations was to come, that, while this temple was standing, he was to appear in this place, and manifest forth his glory. Within this compass of time no one else came, whom these titles fitted, besides Jesus Christ, in whom the Logos, or Word, tabernacled, or placed his Shechinah, and whose glory they beheld as the only begotten of the Father, Jno. i. 14.—Chandler's Defence of Christianity, pp. 71—84.

SYMBOLS OF PEACE AND PROSPERITY.

AN

PROPHECY OF ZECHARIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THIS prophet was colleague with the prophet Haggai, and a worker together with him in forwarding the building of the second temple, Ezr. v. 1.; for two are better than one: Christ sent forth his disciples two and two. Zechariah began to prophesy some time after Haggai; but he continued longer, soared higher in visions and revelations; wrote more, and prophesied more, particularly concerning Christ, than Haggai had done: so "the last shall be first"—the last in time sometimes proves the first in dignity. He begins with a plain practical sermon, expressive of that which was the scope of his prophesying, in the first five verses; but afterwards, to the end of ch. vi., he relates the vision he saw, and the instructions he received immediately from heaven by them. At ch. vii., from an inquiry made by the Jews concerning fasting, he takes occasion to shew them the duty of their present day, and to encourage them to hope for God's favour, to the end of ch. viii. After which there are two sermons, which are both called "burdens of the word of the Lord;" one begins with ch. ix., the other with ch. xii., which probably were preached some time after; the scope of which is, to reprove for sin, and threatens God's judgments against the impenitent, and to encourage those that feared God with assurances of mercy God had in store for his church, and especially of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his kingdom in the world.

A.M. 3484. B.C. 520.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter, after the introduction, ver. 1, we have, I. An awakening call to a sinful people to repent of their sins and return to God, ver. 2—6. II. Great encouragement given to hope for mercy: 1. By the vision of the horses, ver. 7—11; 2. By the prayer of the angel for Jerusalem, and the answer to that prayer, ver. 12—17; 3. By the vision of the four carpenters, that were employed to cut off the four horns with which Judah and Jerusalem were scattered, ver. 18—21.

IN the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the prophet, saying,

2 The LORD hath been sore displeased with your fathers.

3 Therefore say thou unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Turn ye unto me, saith the LORD of hosts,
And I will turn unto you, saith the LORD of hosts.

4 Be ye not as your fathers,
Unto whom the former prophets have cried, saying,
Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Turn ye now from your evil ways, and from your evil [doings:
But they did not hear,
Nor hearken unto me, saith the LORD.

5 Your fathers, where are they?
And the prophets, do they live for ever?

6 But my words and my statutes,
Which I commanded my servants the prophets,
Did they not take hold of your fathers?
And they returned and said,
Like as the LORD of hosts thought to do unto us,
According to our ways, and according to our doings,
So hath he dealt with us.

Here is, First. The foundation of Zechariah's ministry. It is laid in a Divine authority: "The word of the Lord came to him." He received a Divine commission to be God's mouth to the people, and with it instructions what to say. He received of the Lord that which also he delivered unto them. The word of the Lord was to him; it came in the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit, as a real thing, and not a fancy. For the ascertaining of this we have here,

1. The time when the word of the Lord came first to him; or, when the word that next follows came to him. It was "in the second year of Darius." Before the captivity the prophets dated their writings by the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, but now by the reigns of the kings of Persia, to whom they were subjects; such a melancholy change had sin made in their circumstances. Zerubbabel took not so much state upon him as to have public acts dated by the years of his government; and in things of this nature the prophets, as is fit, complied with the usage of the time, and scrupled not to reckon by the years of the heathen kings, as Dan. vii. 1; viii. 1. Zechariah preached his first sermon in the eighth month of this second year of Darius; Haggai preached his in the sixth month of the same year, Hag. i. 1. The people being readily obedient to the will of the Lord in the mouth of Haggai, God blessed them with another prophet; for "to him that hath," and useth well what he has, "more shall be given."

2. The name and family of the prophet to whom the word of the Lord came. He was "Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo;" and he was the prophet, as Haggai is called the prophet, Hag. i. 1. For though in former ages there was one Iddo, a prophet, 2 Chr. xii. 15, yet we have no reason to think that Zechariah was of his progeny, or should be denominated from him. The learned Mr. Pemble is clear of opinion that this Zechariah the son of Berechiah is the same that our Saviour saith was "slain between the temple and the altar," perhaps many years after the rebuilding of the temple, Mat. xxiii. 35; and that our Saviour doth not mean, as is commonly thought, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada; for why should Jehoiada be called Berechiah? And he thinks the manner of Christ's account persuades us to think so; for, reckoning up the innocent blood shed by the Jews, he begins at Abel, and ends even in the last of the holy prophets; whereas, after Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, many prophets and righteous men were put to death by them. It is true there is no mention made in any history of their slaying this Zechariah, but Josephus might industriously conceal that shame of his nation. Perhaps what Zechariah spoke in his prophesying concerning Christ, of his being sold, his being wounded in the house of his friends, and the shepherd being smitten, was verified in the prophet himself, and so he became a type of Christ. Probably being assaulted by his persecutors, he took sanctuary in the court of the priests, and some think he was himself a priest, and so was slain between the porch and the altar.

Secondly. The firstfruits of Zechariah's ministry. Before he came to visions and revelations, and delivered his prophetical discourses, he preached that which was plain and practical; for it is best to begin with that. Before he published the promises of mercy, he published calls to repentance; for thus the way of the Lord must be prepared. Law must be first preached and then gospel. Now,

1. The prophet here puts them in mind of the controversy God had with their fathers; ver. 2, "The Lord has been sore displeased with your fathers," and has laid them under the tokens of his displeasure. You have heard with your ears, and your fathers have told you of it; you have seen with your eyes the woful remains of it. God's quarrel with you has been of long standing, and therefore it is time for you to think of taking it up. Note, The judgments of God which those that went before us were under should be taken as warnings to us not to tread in their steps, and calls to repentance, that we may cut off the entail of the curse, and get it turned into a blessing.

2. He calls them in God's name to return to him, and make their peace with him, ver. 3. God, by him, saith that to this backsliding people which he had often said by his servants the prophets, "Turn ye to me" in a way of faith and repentance, duty and obedience, and "I will turn to you" in a way of favour and mercy, peace and reconciliation. Let the rebels return to their allegiance, and they shall be taken under the protection of the government, and enjoy all the privileges of good subjects; let them change their way, and God will change his: see Mal. iii. 7. But that which is most observable here is, that God is called here the Lord of hosts three times: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts;" it is he that speaks, and therefore you are bound to regard what he saith. "Turn ye to me, saith the Lord of hosts," this speaks the authority and obligation of the command, "and I will turn to you, saith the Lord of hosts," this speaks the validity and value of the promise, so that it is no vain repetition. Note, The consideration of God's almighty power and sovereign dominion should both engage and encourage sinners to repent and turn to him. It is very desirable having the Lord of hosts our friend, and very dreadful having him our enemy.

3. He warns them not to persist in their impenitence, as their fathers had done; ver. 4, "Be ye not as your fathers." Instead of being hardened in their evil courses by the example of their fathers' sin, let them rather be deterred from it by the example of their fathers' punishment. We are apt to be governed very much by precedent, and we are well or ill governed according to the use we make of the precedents before us. The same examples to some are a savour of life unto life, to others a savour of death unto death. Some argued thus: Shall we be wiser than our fathers? they never minded the prophets, and why, then, should we mind them? They made laws against them, and why should we tolerate them? But they are here taught how they should argue: Our fathers slighted the prophets, and God was sore displeased with them for it; therefore let us the more carefully regard what God saith to us by his prophets. Review what is past, and observe,

1st. What was the message that God sent by his servants the prophets to your fathers. "The former prophets cried to your fathers;" they cried aloud, and did not spare, not spare themselves, not spare your fathers; they cried as men in earnest, as men that would be heard; they spoke not as from themselves, but in the name of the Lord of hosts. And this was the substance of what they said, the burthen of every song, the application of every sermon, "Turn ye now from your evil ways, and from your evil doings;" the very same that we now preach to you. Be persuaded to leave your sins; resolve to have no more to do with them; a speedy reformation is the only way to prevent an approaching ruin. Turn ye now from sin to God without delay.

2nd. How little this matter was regarded by your fathers; "But they did not hear," they did not heed. They turned a deaf ear to these calls; "They would not hearken unto me, saith the Lord;" they would not be reclaimed, would not be ruled by the word I sent them: say not then, You will do as your fathers did, for they did amiss: see Jer. xliv. 17. Note, We must not follow the examples of our dear fathers, unless they were God's dear children, nor any farther than they were dutiful and obedient to him.

3rd. What is become of your fathers and of the prophets that preached to them. They are all dead and gone, ver. 5. 1. "Your fathers, where are they?" The whole generation of them is swept away, and their place knows them no more. Note, When we think of our ancestors that are gone through the world, and gone out of it before us, we should think where they are. Here they were in the towns and countries where we live, passing and repassing in the same streets, dwelling in the same houses, trading in the same shops and exchanges, worshipping God in the same churches. But, "Where are they?" They are somewhere still, when they died there was not an end of them; they are in eternity, in the world of spirits, the unchangeable world, to which we are hastening apace. "Where are they?" Those of them that lived and died in sin are in torment; and we are warned by Moses and the prophets, Christ and his apostles, to look to it that we "come not to that place of torment," Lu. xvi. 28, 29. Those of them that lived and died in Christ are in paradise; and if we live and die as they did we shall be with them shortly, with them eternally. 2. The prophets also, "Did they live for ever?" No, they are gone too. The treasure is put into earthen vessels, the water of life into earthen pitchers, often cracked, and brought home broken at last. Christ is a prophet that lives for ever, but all other prophets have a period put to their office. Note, Ministers are dying men, and live not for ever in this world. They are to look upon themselves as such, and to preach accordingly, as those that must be silenced shortly, and know not which sermon may be the last. People are to look upon them as such, and to hear them accordingly, as those that yet a little while have the light with them, that they may walk and work while they have the light. Oh that this weighty consideration had its due weight given it; that we are dying ministers, dealing with dying people, about the concerns of immortal souls and an awful eternity, which both they and we are standing upon the brink of! It concerns us to think of the prophets that are gone, that were before us of old, Jer. xxviii. 8; they that were the glory of men withered and fell, but "the word of the Lord endureth for ever," 1 Pet. i. 24, 25. The prophets that are now, Do we live for ever? so some read it. No, Haggai and Zechariah will not be long with you, and prophecy itself shall shortly cease. In another world both we and our prophets shall live for ever, and to prepare for that world ought to be our great care and business in this.

4th. What the effects of the word were which God spoke to them by his prophets, ver. 6. The preachers died, and the hearers died, but the word of God died not; that took effect, and not one iota or tittle of it fell to the ground. As the rain and snow from heaven, it shall not return void, Isa. lv. 11. He appeals to themselves; they knew very well, First. That the judgments God had threatened were executed upon their fathers, and they were made to feel what they would not believe and fear. "My statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets," the precepts, with the penalties annexed, which I charged them with the delivery of, "did they not take hold of your fathers?" Though God's prophets could not fasten convictions upon them, the calamities threatened overtook them, and they could not escape them or get out of the reach of them. God's words took hold of them, as the bailiff arrests the debtor, and takes him in execution for contempt. Note, The unbelief of man cannot make the threatenings of God's word of none effect, but sooner or later they will take place, if the prescribed course be not taken to prevent the execution of them. God's anger will certainly take hold of those that will not be taken hold of by his authority; for when he judgeth he will overcome. Secondly. That they themselves could not but own the accomplishment of the word of God in the judgments of God that were upon them, and that therein he was righteous, and had done them no wrong. "They returned and said," (they changed their mind, and when it was too late to prevent the ruin of their nation they acknowledged,) "Like as the Lord of hosts thought to do unto us according to our ways and doings," to reckon with us for them, "so hath he dealt with us," and we must acknowledge both his truth and his justice; must blame ourselves only, and have no blame to lay to him. Sero sapiunt Phryges,—'It is late before the Phrygians become wise.' This after-wit, as it is a proof of the truth of God, so it is a proof of the folly of men, that they will look no farther than they can see. They would never be persuaded to say in time, God will be as good as his word, for he is faithful; he will deal with us according to our deserts, for he is righteous. But now they see both plain enough, when the sentence is executed; now "he that runs may read," and publish the exact agreement that appears between the present providences and the former predictions, which then were slighted; between the present punishments and the former sins, which then were persisted in; now they cannot but say, "The Lord is righteous," Dan. ix. 11—13.

7 Upon the four and twentieth day of the eleventh month, which is the month Sebat, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the prophet, saying, 8 I saw by night, and behold a man riding upon a red horse, and he stood among the myrtle trees that were in the bottom; and behind him were there red horses, speckled, and white. 9 Then said I, O my lord, what are these? And the angel that talked with me said unto me, I will shew thee what these be. 10 And the man that stood among the myrtle trees answered and said, These are they whom the LORD hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth. 11 And they answered the angel of the LORD that stood among the myrtle trees, and said, We have walked to and fro through the earth, and, behold, all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest. 12 Then the angel of the LORD answered and said, O LORD of hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years? 13 And the LORD answered the angel that talked with me with good words and comfortable words. 14 So the angel that communed with me said unto me, Cry thou, saying,

Thus saith the LORD of hosts; [jealousy.
I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great 15 And I am very sore displeased with the heathen that are at ease:
For I was but a little displeased,
And they helped forward the affliction.
16 Therefore thus saith the LORD;
I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies:
My house shall be built in it, saith the LORD of hosts,
And a line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem.
17 Cry yet, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad;
And the LORD shall yet comfort Zion,
And shall yet choose Jerusalem.

We now come to visions and revelations of the Lord; for in that way God chose to speak by Zechariah, to awaken the people's attention, and to engage their humble reverence of the word, and their humble inquiries into it, and to fix it the more in their minds and memories. Most of the following visions seem designed for the comfort of the Jews, now newly returned out of captivity, and their encouragement to go on with the building of the temple. The scope of this vision (which is an introduction to the rest) is to assure the Jews of the care God took of them, and the eye of his providence that was upon them for good, now in their present state, when they seemed to be deserted, and their case deplorable. The vision is dated (ver. 7) the twenty-fourth day of the eleventh month, three months after he preached that sermon (ver. 1) in which he called them to repentance from the consideration of God's judgments. Finding that that sermon had a good effect, and that they returned to God in a way of duty, the assurances he had given them are confirmed that God would return to them in a way of mercy. Now observe here,

First. What the prophet saw, and the explication of that.

1. He saw a grove of myrtle-trees; a dark, shady grove, down in a bottom, hid by the adjacent hills, so that you were not aware of it till you were just upon it. This represented the low, dark, solitary, melancholy condition of the Jewish church at this time. They were overtopped by all their neighbours, buried in obscurity; what friends they had were hidden, and there appeared no way of relief and succour for them. Note, The church has not been always visible, but sometimes hid, as the "woman in the wilderness," Rev. xii. 6.

2. He saw a man mounted upon a red horse, standing in the midst of this shady myrtle grove. This man is no other than the man Christ Jesus, the same that appeared to Joshua with "his sword drawn in his hand," as "captain of the host of the Lord," Jos. v. 13, 14, and to St. John with his bow and his crown, Rev. vi. 2. Though the church was in a low condition, yet Christ was present in the midst of it. Was it hid by the hills? He was much more hid in the myrtle grove, yet hid as in an ambush, ready to appear for the seasonable relief of his people, to their happy surprise. Compare Isa. xlv. 15, "Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself," and yet Israel's God and Saviour at the same time, their "Holy One in the midst of them." He was riding, as a man of war, as a man in haste, riding on the heavens for the help of his people, Deu. xxxiii. 26. He rode on a red horse, either naturally so or dyed red with the blood of war, as this same victorious prince appeared red in his apparel, Isa. lxiii. 1, 2. Red is a fiery colour, noting that he is jealous for Jerusalem, ver. 14, and very angry at her enemies. Christ under the law appeared on a red horse, noting the terror of that dispensation, and that he had yet his conflict before him, when he was to resist unto blood. But under the Gospel he appears on a white horse, Rev. vi. 2, and again, ch. xix. 11, noting that he has now gained the victory, and rides in triumph, and hangs out the white, not the bloody flag.

3. He saw a troop of horse attending him, ready to receive and obey his orders. Behind him there were some red horses, and some speckled, and some white, angels attending the Lord Jesus, ready to be employed by him for the service of his church, some in acts of judgment, others of mercy, others in mixed events. Note, The king of the church has angels at command, not only to do him honour, but to minister for the good of those that are his.

4. He inquired into the signification of this vision. He had an angel talking with him as his instructor, besides those he saw in the vision. So had Ezekiel, ch. xl. 3, and Daniel, ch. viii. 16. Zechariah asked him, ver. 9, "O, my Lord, what are these?" And it should seem this angel that talked with him was Christ himself, the "man on the red horse," whom the rest were attendants on; to him immediately Zechariah addresseth himself. Would we be acquainted with the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, we must make our application not to angels, they are themselves learners, but to Christ himself, who is alone "able to take the book and open the seals," Rev. v. 7. The prophet's question implies a humble acknowledgment of his own ignorance, and an earnest desire to be informed. O let me know what these are! This he desired, not for the satisfying of his curiosity, but that he might be furnished with something proper for the comfort and encouragement of the people of God, in their present distress.

5. He received from the angel that talked with him, ver. 9, and from the man that stood among the myrtle-trees, ver. 10, the interpretation of this vision. Note, Jesus Christ is ready to instruct those that are humbly desirous to be taught the things of God. He presently said, "I will shew thee what these be." What knowledge we have, or may have, concerning the world of spirits, we are indebted to Christ for. The account given him was, "These are they whom the Lord hath sent," they are his messengers, his envoys, appointed (as his eyes are said to do, 2 Chr. xvi. 9,) to walk, to run, to fly swiftly through the earth, to observe what is done in it, and to execute the Divine commands. God needs them not, but he is pleased to employ them, and we need the comfort arising from the doctrine of their administration.

Secondly. What the prophet heard, and what instructions were thereby given him. Faith comes by hearing, and generally in visions there was something said.

1. He heard the report or representation which the angels made to Christ of the present state of the world, ver. 11. They had been out abroad as flying posts, ("being hastened by the King of kings' commandment," Est. iii. 15,) and being returned, they give this account to the "angel that stood among the myrtle-trees," (for to the Lord Jesus angels themselves are accountable,) "We have walked to and fro through the earth, and behold all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest." We are taught to pray that the will of God may be done by men on earth as it is done by the angels in heaven; and here we see what need we have to pray so, for it is far from being so. For, 1st. We find the world of angels here very busy. Those that are employed in the court above rest not day nor night from praising God, which is their business there; and those that are employed in the camp below are never idle nor lose time, they are still ascending and descending upon the Son of man, Jno. i. 51, as on Jacob's ladder, Gen. xxviii. 12; they are still "walking to and fro through the earth." Thus active, thus industrious, Satan owns himself to be to do mischief, Job i. 7. It is well for us that good angels bestir themselves as much to do good, and that here in this earth we have guardians going about continually seeking to do us a kindness, as we have adversaries that as roaring lions go about continually seeking to devour us. Though holy angels in this earth meet with a great deal that is disagreeable, yet, while they are going on God's errands, they stick not to walk to and fro through it. Their own habitation, which those that fell liked not, they will like the better when they return. 2nd. We find the world of mankind here very careless: "All the earth sitteth still, and is at rest," while all the church is made uneasy, tossed with tempests, and not comforted. Those that are strangers to the church are secure, those that are enemies to it are successful. The Chaldeans and Persians dwell at ease, while the poor Jews are continually alarmed; as when "the king and Haman sat down to drink, but the city Shushan was perplexed." The children of men are merry and jovial, but none grieved for the affliction of God's children. Note, It is sad to think what a deep sleep the world is cast into, what a spirit of slumber hath seized the generality of mankind, that are under God's wrath and Satan's power, and yet secure and unconcerned! they sit still, and are at rest, Lu. xvii. 26, &c.

2. He heard Christ's intercession with the Father for his afflicted church, ver. 12. The angels related the posture of affairs in this lower world, but we read not of any prayers they made for the redress of the grievances they had made a remonstrance of; no, it is the angel among the myrtle-trees that is the great intercessor. Upon the report of the angels, he immediately turned heavenward, and said, Lord, wilt thou not have mercy on thy church? 1st. The thing he intercedes for is mercy, as Ps. lxxxv. 7, "Shew us thy mercy, O Lord." Note, God's mercy is all in all to the church's comfort; and all his mercy must be hoped for through Christ's mediation. 2nd. The thing he complains of is, the delay of this mercy; "How long wilt thou not have mercy!" He knows that mercies through him "shall be built up for ever," Ps. lxxxix. 2, but thinks it long that the building is deferred. 3rd. The objects of compassion recommended to the Divine mercies are, Jerusalem, the holy city, and other the cities of Judah, that were now in ruins, for God had had indignation against them now threescore and ten years. He mentioned seventy years, because that was the time fixed in the Divine counsels for the continuance of the captivity. So long the indignation lasted; and though now for a little space grace had been shewed them from the Lord their God, to give them some reviving, Ezr. ix. 8, yet the scars of those seventy years' captivity still remained so deep, so painful, that that is the melancholy string they still harp upon, the Divine indignation during those seventy years. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that, whereas the seventy years of captivity were reckoned from Jehoiakim's fourth year, and ended in the first of Cyrus, these seventy years are to be computed from the eleventh of Zedekiah, when Jerusalem and the temple were burnt, about nineteen years after the first captivity, and which ended in this second year of Darius Hystaspes, about seventeen years after Cyrus's proclamation; as that seventy years mentioned ch. vii. 5 was about nineteen years after. The captivity went off as it came on, gradually. Lord, we are still under the burden of the seventy years' wrath, and "Wilt thou be angry with us for ever?"

3. He heard a gracious reply given to this intercession of Christ's for his church; for it is a prevailing intercession, always acceptable, and "him the Father heareth always," ver. 13. "The Lord answered the angel," this angel of the covenant, "with good words, comfortable words," with promises of mercy and deliverance, and the perfecting of what he had begun in favour to them. These were comfortable words to Christ, who is grieved in the grievances of his church, and comfortable to all that mourn with Zion. God often answers prayer with good words, when he doth not presently appear in great works; and those good words are real answers to prayer. Men's good words will not feed the body, Jas. ii. 16, but God's good words will feed the faith; for saying and doing with him are not two things, though they are with us.

4. He heard that reply which was given to the angel repeated to himself, with a commission to publish it to the children of his people, for their comfort. "The revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave to him" he "signified to his servant John," and by him to the churches, Rev. i. 1, 4. Thus all the good words and comfortable words of the Gospel we receive from Jesus Christ, as he received them from the Father, in answer to the prayer of his blood, and his ministers are appointed to preach them to all the world. Now God would "speak comfortably to Jerusalem." Zechariah is "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord." The voice said, Cry, cry then. The prophets must now cry as loud to shew God's people their comforts as ever they did formerly to shew them their transgressions, Isa. xl. 2, 3, 6. And if he ask what he shall cry, he is here instructed.

1st. He must proclaim the wrath God has in store for the enemies of Jerusalem. He is "jealous for Zion with great jealousy," ver. 14; that is, he takes himself to be highly affronted by the injuries and indignities that are done to his church, as he had been formerly by the iniquities found in his church. The earth "sat still and was at rest," ver. 21, not relenting at all, or shewing the least remorse for all the mischief they had done to Jerusalem, as Joseph's brethren, who, when they had sold him, sat down to eat bread; and this God took very ill; ver. 15, "I am very sore displeased with the heathen that are at ease," and have no concern for the afflicted church. Much more will he be displeased with those that are at ease in Zion, Am. vi. 1, with Zion's own sons, that sympathise not with her in her sorrows. But this was not all; they were not only not concerned for her, but they were concerned against her. "I was but a little displeased" with my people, and designed to correct them moderately; but those that were employed as instruments of the correction cast off all pity, and with the greatest rage and malice helped forward the affliction, and added to it, persecuting those whom God had smitten, Ps. lxix. 26, and insulting over those whom he had troubled: see Isa. x. 5; xlvii. 6; Eze. xxv. 12. 15. Note, God is displeased with those that help forward the affliction even of such as suffer justly; for true humanity in such a case is good divinity.

2nd. He must proclaim the mercy God has in store for Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, ver. 16. He must cry, "Thus saith the Lord, I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies." I was going away in wrath, but I am now returning in love. Cry yet to the same purpose, ver. 17. There must now be line upon line for consolation, as formerly there had been for conviction. The Lord, even the Lord of hosts, assures them, First. That the temple shall be built that is now but in the building. This good work they are now about, though it meet with much discouragement, shall be perfected, and they shall have the tokens of God's presence, and opportunities of conversing with him, and worshipping him as formerly. Note, It is good news indeed to any place to hear that God will build his house in it. Secondly. That Jerusalem shall again be builded as a city compact together, which had formerly been its glory; Ps. cxxii. 3, "A line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem," in order to the rebuilding of it with great exactness and uniformity. Thirdly. That the nation shall again become populous and rich, though now diminished and impoverished; not only Jerusalem, but other cities that are reduced and lie in a little compass, shall yet spread abroad, or be diffused. Their suburbs shall extend far, and colonies shall be transplanted from them, and this through prosperity. They shall be so numerous, and so wealthy, that there shall not be room for them; they shall complain the place is too strait, Isa. xlix. 20. As they had been scattered and spread abroad through their calamities, so they should now be through their prosperity. "Let thy fountains be dispersed," Pr. v. 16. The cities that should thus increase God calls his cities; they are blessed by him, and they are fruitful and multiply, and replenish the land. Fourthly. That all their present sorrows should not only be balanced, but for ever silenced, by Divine consolations; "The Lord shall yet comfort Zion." Yet at length, though her griefs and grievances may continue long, God has comforts in reserve for Zion and all her mourners. Fifthly. That all this will be the fruit of God's preventing, distinguishing favour. He shall yet choose Jerusalem, shall renew his choice, renew his covenant, shall make it appear he has chosen Jerusalem. As he first built them up into a people, when he brought them out of Egypt, so he will now rebuild them when he brings them out of Babylon; not for any worthiness of theirs, but in pursuance of his own choice, Deu. vii. 7, 8. Jerusalem is the city he has chosen, and he will not cast it off.

18 Then lifted I up mine eyes, and saw, and behold four horns. 19 And I said unto the angel that talked with me, What be these? And he answered me, These are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem. 20 And the LORD shewed me four carpenters. 21 Then said I, What come these to do? And he spake, saying, These are the horns which have scattered Judah, so that no man did lift up his head: but these are come to fray them, to cast out the horns of the Gentiles, which lifted up their horn over the land of Judah to scatter it.

It is the comfort and triumph of the church, Isa. lix. 19, that "when the enemy shall come in like a flood," with mighty force and fury, then "the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." Now in this vision (the second that this prophet had) we have an illustration of that, God's Spirit making a stand, and making head against the formidable power of the church's adversaries.

First. We have here the enemies of the church bold and daring, and threatening to be its death, to cut off the name of Israel; such the people of God had lately been insulted by. I looked, and behold, four horns, ver. 18, which are explained, ver. 19, "These are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem;" that is, the Jews, both in the country and in the city, because they were the Israel of God. They have 'tossed them,' (so some read it,) as furious bulls with their horns toss that which they are enraged at. They have scattered them, "so that no man did lift up his head," ver. 21. No man durst shew his face for fear of them, much less give them any opposition, or make head against them. They are horns, noting their dignity and dominion, horns exalted, and their strength and power and violence. They are four horns, for the Jews are surrounded with them on every side; when they avoid one horn that pusheth at them, they run upon another. The men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and many of Israel, that joined themselves to them, set about the building of the temple, but the enemies of that work from all sides pushed at them, and drove them from it. Rehum and Shimshai, and other the Samaritans, that opposed the building of the temple, were these horns, Ezr. iv. 8, so were Sanballat and Tobiah, and the Ammonites and Arabians, that opposed the building of the wall, Neh. iv. 7. Note, The church's enemies have horns, and use them to the hindrance of every good work. The great enemy of the New Testament church hath seven heads and ten horns, Rev. xvii. 3, so that they who endeavour to do the church any service must expect to be pushed at.

Secondly. We have here the friends of the church active and prevailing. The prophet did himself lift up his eyes, and see the four horns, and saw them so formidable that he began to despair of the safety of every good man, and the success of every good work; but the Lord then shewed him four carpenters, or smiths, that were empowered to cut off these horns, ver. 20, 21. With an eye of sense we see the power of the enemies of the church,—look which way we will, the world shews us that; but it is with an eye of faith that we see it safe notwithstanding,—it is the Lord that shews us that, as he opened the eyes of the prophet's servant to see the angelic guards round about his master, 2 Kin. vi. 17. Observe, Those that were to fray or break the horns of the Gentiles, and to cast them out, were,

1. Carpenters, or smiths, (for they are supposed by some to have been horns of iron,) men that had skill and ability to do it, whose proper business it was, and who understood their business, and had tools at hand to do it with. Note, God calls those to serve the interests of his church whom he either finds or makes fit for it. If there be horns against the church, which speak the force and fury of beasts, there are carpenters for the church, which speak the wisdom and forecast of men, by which they find ways to master the strongest beasts; for "every kind of beast is tamed and has been tamed of mankind," Jas. iii. 7.

2. They were four carpenters; as many horns, so many hands to saw them off. Note, Which way soever the church is threatened with mischief, and opposition given to its interests, God can find out ways and means to check the force, to restrain the wrath, and make it turn to his praise. Some by these four carpenters understand Zerubbabel and Joshua, Ezra and Nehemiah, that carried on the work of God in despite of the opposition given to it. Those horned beasts broke into God's vineyard, to tread it down, but the good magistrates, and the good ministers, whom God raised up, though they had not power to "cut off the horns of the wicked," as David did, Ps. lxxv. 5, 10, yet they frightened them, and cast them out. Note, When God has work to do he will raise up some to do it, and others to defend it, and protect those that are employed in the doing of it.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter we have, I. Another vision which the prophet saw, not for his own entertainment, but for his satisfaction, and the edification of those to whom he was sent, ver. 1, 2. II. A sermon upon it in the rest of the chapter, 1. By way of explication of the vision, shewing it to be a prediction of the replenishing of Jerusalem, and of its safety and honour, ver. 3—5; 2. By way of application; here is, 1st. A use of exhortation to the Jews that were yet in Babylon, pressing them to hasten their return to their own land, ver. 6—9; 2nd. A use of consolation to those that were returned, in reference to the many difficulties they had to struggle with, ver. 10—12; 3rd. A use of caution to all, not to prescribe to God, or limit him, but patiently to wait for him, ver. 13.

I LIFTED up mine eyes again, and looked, and behold a man with a measuring line in his hand. 2 Then said I, Whither goest thou? And he said unto me, To measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof. 3 And, behold, the angel that talked with me went forth, and another angel went out to meet him, 4 And said unto him, Run, speak to this young man, saying,

Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls
For the multitude of men and cattle therein:
5 For I, saith the LORD, will be unto her a wall of fire round about,
And will be the glory in the midst of her.

This prophet was ordered in God's name to assure the people, ch. i. 16, that "a line should be stretched forth upon Jerusalem." Now here we have that promise illustrated and confirmed, that the prophet might deliver that part of his message to the people with the more clearness and assurance.

First, He sees in a vision a man going to measure Jerusalem; ver. 1, 2, "He lift up his eyes again, and looked." God had shewed him that which was very encouraging to him, ch. i. 20, and therefore now he "lift up his eyes again and looked." Note, The comfortable sight which by faith we have had of God's goodness made to pass before us, should engage us to lift up our eyes again, and to search farther into the discoveries made us of the Divine grace; for there is still more to be seen. In the close of the foregoing chapter he had seen Jerusalem's enemies baffled and broken, so that now he begins to hope she shall not be ruined. But that is not enough to make her happy, and therefore that is not all that is promised; here is more carpenter's work to be done. When David had resolved to "cut off the horns of the wicked," he engaged likewise that the horns of the righteous should be exalted, Ps. lxxv. 10. And so doth the Son of David here; for he is the man, even "the man Christ Jesus," whom the prophet sees "with a measuring line in his hand;" for he is the master builder of his church, Heb. iii. 3, and he builds exactly by line and level. Zechariah took the boldness to ask him whither he was going, and what he designed to do with that measuring line; and he readily told him he was going to measure Jerusalem, to take a particular account of the dimensions of it each way, that it might be computed what was necessary for the making a wall about it, and that it might appear, by comparing the dimensions with the vast numbers that should inhabit it, what additions were necessary to be made for the receiving and containing of them. When multitudes flock to Jerusalem, Isa. lx. 4, it is time for her to "enlarge the place of her tent," Isa. liv. 2. Note, God takes notice of the extent of his church, and will take care that when never so many guests are brought into the wedding supper, yet still there shall be room, Lu. xiv. 22; in the "New Jerusalem, my Father's house" above, "there are many mansions."

Secondly. He is informed that this vision means well to Jerusalem; that the measuring line he saw was not a line of confusion, as that Isa. xxxiv. 11; not a line to mete out for destruction, as when God "purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion, he stretched out a line," Lam. ii. 8; but it is as when he "divided the inheritance by line," Ps. lxxviii. 55. The angel that talked with the prophet went forth as he designed to measure Jerusalem, but "another angel went out to meet him," to desire that he would first explain this vision to the prophet, that it might not occasion him any uneasy speculations. "Run and speak to this young man," for it seems the prophet entered upon his prophecy when he was young, yet no man ought to despise his youth when God thus highly honoured it. He is a young man, not experienced, and may be ready to fear the worst, therefore bid him hope the best; tell him that Jerusalem shall be both safe and great.

1. As safe and great as numbers of men can make it; ver. 4, Jerusalem "shall be inhabited as towns without walls;" that is, the inhabitants of it shall increase, and multiply, and replenish it to admiration, so as to extend itself far beyond the present dimensions, which now there is an account taken of. The walls of a city, as they defend it, so they straiten and confine it, and keep its inhabitants from multiplying beyond such a pitch; but Jerusalem, even when it is walled to keep off the enemy, yet shall be inhabited "as towns without walls;" the city shall be in a manner lost in the suburbs, as London is, where the out parishes are more populous than those within the walls. So shall it be with Jerusalem; it shall be extended as freely as if it had no walls at all, and yet shall be as safe as if it had the strongest walls, such a multitude of men (which are the best walls of a city) shall there be therein, and of cattle too, to be not only food, but wealth too, for those men. Note, The increase of the numbers of a people is a great blessing, is a fruit of God's blessing on them, and an earnest of farther blessings; Ps. cvii. 38, "They are multiplied, for he blesseth them."

2. As safe and great as the presence of God can make it, ver. 5. 1st. It shall be safe, for God himself will be a "wall of fire round about it." Jerusalem had no walls about it at this time, but lay naked and exposed. Formerly, when it had walls, the enemy not only broke through them, but broke them down; but now "God will be unto her a wall of fire." Some think it alludes to shepherds that made fires about their flocks, or travellers that made fires about their tents in desert places, to frighten wild beasts from them. God will not only make a hedge about them, as he did about Job, ch. i. 10, not only make walls and bulwarks about them, Isa. xxvi. 1, those may be battered down; not only be as the mountains round about them, Ps. cxxv. 2, mountains may be got over; but he will be a wall of fire round them, which can neither be broke through nor scaled, nor undermined, nor the foundations of it sapped, nor can it be attempted or approached without danger to the assailants. God will not only make a wall of fire about her, but he will himself be such a wall; for "our God is a consuming fire" to his and his church's enemies; he is a wall of fire, not on one side only, but round about on every side. 2nd. It shall be great, for God himself "will be the glory in the midst of it." His temple, his altar, shall be set up and attended there, and his institutions observed; and there then shall the tokens of his special presence and favour be, which will be the glory in the midst of them, will make them truly admirable in the eyes of all about them. God will have honour from them, and put honour upon them. Note, Those that have God for their God have him for their glory; those that have him in the midst of them have glory in the midst of them; and thence the church is said to be "all glorious within." And those persons and places that have God to be "the glory in the midst of them" have him for "a wall of fire round about them;" for "upon all that glory there is" and shall be "a defence," Isa. iv. 5. Now this was fulfilled in part in Jerusalem, which in process of time became a very flourishing city, and made a very great figure in those parts of the world, much beyond what could have been expected, considering how low it was brought, and how long it was ere it recovered itself. But it was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, which is extended far, as towns without walls, by the admission of the Gentiles into it; and which hath God, the Son of God, for its prince and protector.

6 Ho, ho, come forth,
And flee from the land of the north, saith the LORD:
For I have spread you abroad
As the four winds of the heaven, saith the LORD.
7 Deliver thyself, O Zion,
That dwellest with the daughter of Babylon.
8 For thus saith the LORD of hosts;
After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you:
For he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye.
9 For, behold, I will shake mine hand upon them,
And they shall be a spoil to their servants:
And ye shall know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me.

One would have thought Cyrus's proclamation, which gave liberty to the captive Jews to return to their own land, would have sufficed to bring them all back; and that, as when Pharaoh gave them leave to quit Egypt and their house of bondage there, they should not have left a hoof behind; but it seems it had not that effect. There were about forty thousand whose spirits God stirred up to go, and they went; but many, perhaps the greater part, stayed behind. The land of their captivity was to most of them the land of their nativity; they had taken root there, had gained a settlement, and many of them a very comfortable one. Some perhaps had got estates and preferments there, and they did not think they could mend themselves by returning to their own land; Patria est ubicunque bene est,—'My country is every spot where I feel myself happy.' They had no great affection for their own land, and apprehended the difficulties in their way to it insuperable. This proceeded from an ill cause, a distrust of the power and promise of God, a love of ease and worldly wealth, and an indifferency to the religion of their country, and to the God of Israel himself; and it had an ill effect, for it was an implicit censure of those, as foolish, and rash, and given to change, that did return, and a weakening of their hands in the work of God. Such as these could not sing Ps. cxxxvii. in their captivity, for they had forgot thee, O Jerusalem, and were so far from preferring thee before their chief joy that they preferred any joy before thee. Here is therefore another proclamation issued out by the God of Israel, strictly charging and commanding all his freeborn subjects, wherever they were dispersed, speedily to return to their own land, and render themselves at their respective posts there. They are loudly summoned, ver. 6, "Ho, ho, come forth, and flee from the land of the north, saith the Lord." This fitly follows upon the promise of the rebuilding and enlarging of Jerusalem. If God will build it for them and their comfort, they must come and inhabit it for him and his glory, and not continue sneaking in Babylon. Note, The promises and privileges with which God's people are blessed should engage us, whatever it cost us, to join ourselves to them, and cast in our lot among them. When Zion is enlarged to make more room for all God's Israel, it is the greatest madness imaginable for any of them to stay in Babylon. The captivity of a sinful state is by no means to be continued in, though a man be never so easy upon temporal accounts; no, "Come forth and flee," with all speed, and lose no time. Escape for thy life, look not behind thee. To induce them to hasten their return, let them consider,

First. They are now dispersed, and were concerned to incorporate themselves for their mutual, common defence; ver. 6, "I have spread you abroad as the four winds of heaven," some sent into one corner of the world, and some into another, and this has been your condition a long time; wherefore you should now think of coming together again, to help one another. God owns that his scattering them was in wrath, and therefore they must take this invitation as a token of God's being willing to be reconciled to them again; so that they kicked at his kindness in refusing to accept the call.

Secondly. They are now in bondage, and were concerned to assert their own liberty, and therefore "Deliver thyself, O Zion," flee from the oppressor, and make the best of thy way; let us see some such bold efforts and struggles to help thyself as become the generous, gracious seed of Abraham, ver. 7. Note, When Christ has proclaimed that deliverance to the captives which he has himself wrought out, it then concerns each of us to "deliver ourselves, to loose ourselves from the bands of our necks," Isa. lii. 2; and, since we are under grace, to resolve that "sin shall not have dominion over us." Zion herself is here said to dwell with the daughter of Babylon, because many of the precious sons of Zion dwelt there; and where the people of God are there the church of God is, for it is not tied to places. Now it is not fit that Zion should "dwell with the daughter of Babylon." What communion can light have with darkness? Zion will be in danger of partaking with the daughter of Babylon, both in her sins and in her plagues; and therefore, "Come out of her, my people," Rev. xviii. 4; "Deliver thyself, O Zion," by a speedy return to thine own land, and do not destroy thyself by continuing in that polluted, devoted land. Those that would be found among the generation of God's children must save themselves from the untoward generation of this world; it was St. Peter's charge to his new converts, Acts ii. 40.

Thirdly. They have seemed to be forsaken and forgotten of God, but God will now make it to appear that he espouseth their cause, and will plead it with jealousy, ver. 8, 9. It was a discouragement to those who remained in Babylon to hear of the difficulties and opposition which their brethren met with that were returned, by which they were still in danger of being crushed and overpowered; and we had as good sit still (think they) as rise up and fall. In answer to this objection, the angel that talked with the prophet, that is, Jesus Christ, tells him what he had commission to do for their protection, and the perfecting of their salvation, and therein has an eye to the great redemption which in the fulness of time he was the author of. Christ, who is Jehovah, and the Lord of hosts, of all the hosts of heaven and earth, in both which he has a sovereign power, saith, "He," that is, the Father, "hath sent me." Note, What Jesus Christ hath done and doth for his church against his enemies he was sent and commissioned by the Father to do. With great satisfaction he often speaks of the Father that sent him.

1. He is sent after the glory. After the glorious beginning of their deliverance he is sent to perfect it, for he is the finisher of that work which he is the author of. Christ is sent in the first place to the nation and people of the Jews, to whom pertained the glory, Rom. ix. 4, and he was himself the glory of his people Israel. But after the glory, after his care of them, he is sent to the nations, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, by the power of his Gospel to captivate them, and bring them, and every high thought among them, into obedience to himself.

2. He is sent to the nations that spoiled them, to take vengeance on them for the wrongs done to Zion, when the year of his redeemed comes, and the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion, Isa. xxxiv. 8. He is sent to shake his hand upon them, to lift up his mighty hand against them, and to lay upon them his heavy hand, to "bruise them with a rod of iron," and "dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel," Ps. ii. 9. Some think it intimates how easily God can subdue and humble them with the turn of his hand; it is but shaking his hand over them and the work is done. "They shall be a spoil to their servants," shall be enslaved to those whom they had enslaved, and be plundered by those whom they had plundered. In Esther's time this was fulfilled, when the Jews had rule over them that hated them, Est. ix. 1, and often in the time of the Maccabees. And the promise is farther fulfilled in Christ's victory over our spiritual enemies, his spoiling principalities and powers, and making a show of them openly, Col. ii. 15. And it is still in force to the gospel church; Christ will reckon with all that are enemies to it, and sooner or later will make them his footstool, Ps. cx. 1; Rev. iii. 9.

3. What he will do for his church shall be an evident proof of God's tender care of it, and affection to it; "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye." This is a high expression of God's love to his church. By his resentment of the injuries done to her it appears how dear she is to him, how he interests himself in all her interests, and takes what is done against her not only as done against himself, but as done against the very apple of his eye, the tenderest part, which nature has made very fine, has put a double guard upon, and taught us to be in a special manner careful of, and which the least touch is a great offence to. This encourageth the people of God to pray with David, Ps. xvii. 8, "Keep me as the apple of thine eye;" and engageth them to do as Solomon directs, Pr. vii. 2, to keep his law as the apple of their eye. Some understand it thus, 'He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his own eye;' whoever do you any injury will prove in the issue to have done the greatest injury to themselves.

4. It shall be an evident proof of Christ's mission; "Ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me" to be the protector of his church, that the promises made to the church are Yea and Amen in him. Christ's victory over our spiritual enemies proves that the Father sent him, and was with him.

10 Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion:
For, lo, I come,
And I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the LORD.
11 And many nations shall be joined to the LORD in that [day,
And shall be my people:
And I will dwell in the midst of thee,
And thou shalt know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto thee.
12 And the LORD shall inherit Judah his portion
In the holy land,
And shall choose Jerusalem again.
13 Be silent, O all flesh, before the LORD:
For he is raised up out of his holy habitation.

Here is, First. Joy proclaimed to the church of God, to the daughter of Zion, that had separated herself from the daughter of Babylon. The Jews that were returned were in distress and danger, their enemies in the neighbourhood were spiteful against them, their friends that remained in Babylon were cool towards them, shy of them, and declined coming to their assistance, and yet they are bid to sing, and to rejoice, even in tribulation. Note, Those that have recovered their purity, and integrity, and spiritual liberty, though they have not yet recovered their outward prosperity, have reason to sing and rejoice, to give glory to God, and take comfort to themselves.

1. God will have a people among them. If their brethren in Babylon will not come to them, those of other nations shall, and shall replenish Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah; "Many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day," that are now at a distance from him, and strangers to him. The Jewish nation, after the captivity, multiplied very much by the accession of proselytes to it, that were naturalised, and were entitled to all the privileges of native Israelites, and perhaps they were equal in number; and therefore Paul mentions it as an honour to him which many Jews had not, that he was "of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews," Phil. iii. 5. And this was an earnest of the bringing in of the Gentiles into the Christian church; and in that, this and other like promises were to have their full accomplishment. It was therefore strange that that should be so great an offence to the Jews as we find it was in the apostles' times, which was promised them as a blessing in the prophets' times, that many nations should be joined to the Lord. And as there had been one law so should there be one Gospel for the stranger and for those born in the land; whatever nation they come from, when they "join themselves to the Lord they shall be my people," as dear to God as ever Israel had been. Note, God will own those for his people that with purpose of heart join themselves to him; and when many do so, we ought to look upon them, not with a jealous eye, but with a joyful one. Angels rejoice, and therefore so should the daughter of Zion, when many nations are joined to the Lord.

2. They shall have his presence among them; "Sing and rejoice," for "I come." Those to whom God comes have reason to rejoice, for he will be to them their chief joy. God will come, not to make them a visit only, but to reside with them, and preside over them; "I will dwell in the midst of thee," ver. 10; and it is repeated, ver. 11, because it was to have a double accomplishment: 1st. In the dedication of the temple, in their regularly observing all God's institutions there, and God's owning them therein. Those have God dwelling in the midst of them that have his ordinances administered in their purity, and a Divine power going along with them; with these tokens of God's presence the Jewish church was blessed after this as much as ever. 2nd. In the incarnation of Christ. He that here promiseth to dwell among them is that "Lord, whom the Lord of hosts hath sent," ver. 11; and, therefore, must be the Lord Jesus, who came and dwelt in the midst of the Jewish nation, the eternal Word that was made flesh and dwelt among us. This was the great honour reserved for that nation in its last days; the promise of it effectually secured their continuance till it was accomplished. They could not be destroyed while that blessing was in them. And the prospect of it according to the promise was the great support and comfort to them who looked for redemption in Jerusalem. It is promised that when Christ comes and dwells among them they shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent him; all that were Israelites indeed were made to know it; sufficient proofs were given of it by the miracles Christ wrought, so that they might have known it, and yet there were those that perished in ignorance and unbelief, that would not know it; for, if they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.

3. They shall have all their ancient dignities and privileges restored to them again, ver. 12. 1st. Canaan shall be a holy land again; not polluted by sin as it had been formerly, nor profaned by the enemies as it had been of late; it shall be an inclosure again and not laid in common. 2nd. Judah shall be in this holy land, shall inhabit it, and enjoy the comfort of it, and no longer be lost and scattered in Babylon. 3rd. Judah shall be God's portion, which he will delight in, which shall be dear to him, by which he will be served, and in which he will be glorified; the Lord's portion is his people. 4th. God will inherit Judah again as his portion, will claim his interest, and recover the possession out of the hands of those that had invaded his right. He will protect his people, and govern them as a man doth his inheritance, and will be at home among them. He will choose Jerusalem again, as he had chosen it formerly, to put his name there; will renew and confirm the choice, and continue it a chosen place till it must resign its honours to the Jerusalem that is from above. Though the election seemed to be set aside for awhile, yet it shall obtain.

Secondly. Here is silence proclaimed to all the world beside, ver. 13. The daughter of Zion must sing, but all flesh must be silent. Observe here,

1. A very awful description of God's appearances for the relief of his people. "He is raised up out of his holy habitation," as a man out of sleep, Ps. xliv. 23; lxxviii. 65; or as a man entering with resolution upon a business that he will go through with. Heaven is his holy habitation above, thence we must expect him to appear, Isa. lxiv. 1. His temple is so in this lower world, thence from between the cherubims he will shine forth, Ps. lxxx. 1. He is about to do something unusual, unexpected, and very surprising, and to plead his people's cause, which had long seemed neglected.

2. A seasonable caution and direction at such a time. "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord," before Christ and his grace,—let not flesh object against the methods he takes. Before God and his providence the enemies of the church shall be silenced, all iniquity shall stop her mouth; the friends of the church must be silent. Leave it to God to take his own way, and neither prescribe to him what he should do nor quarrel with him whatever he doth. Be still, and know that he is God; Stand still, and see his salvation: see Hab. ii. 20; Zep. i. 7. Silently acquiesce in his holy will, and patiently wait the issue, as those that are assured, when God is raised up out of his holy habitation, he will not retreat or sit down again till he has accomplished his whole work.

CHAPTER III.

The vision in the foregoing chapter gave assurances of the re-establishing of the civil interests of the Jewish nation, the promises of which terminated in Christ. Now the vision in this chapter concerns their church state, and their ecclesiastical interests, and assures them that they shall be put into a good posture again; and the promises of this also have an eye to Christ, who is not only our Prince, but the High Priest of our profession, of whom Joshua was a type. Here is, I. A vision relating to Joshua, as the representative of the church in his time, representing the disadvantages he laboured under, and the people in him, with the redress of the grievances of both. 1. He is accused by Satan, but is brought off by Christ, ver. 1, 2; 2. He appears in filthy garments, but had them changed, ver. 3—5; 3. He is assured of being established in his office if he carry himself well, ver. 6, 7. II. A sermon relating to Christ, who is here called the Branch, who should be endued with all perfections for his undertaking, should be carried triumphantly through it, and by whom we should have pardon and peace, ver. 8—10.

AND he shewed me Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the LORD, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him. 2 And the LORD said unto Satan,

The LORD rebuke thee, O Satan;
Even the LORD that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee:
Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?

3 Now Joshua was clothed with filthy garments, and stood before the angel. 4 And he answered and spake unto those that stood before him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from him. And unto him he said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment. 5 And I said, Let them set a fair mitre upon his head. So they set a fair mitre upon his head, and clothed him with garments. And the angel of the LORD stood by. 6 And the angel of the LORD protested unto Joshua, saying, 7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;

MITRES.

If thou wilt walk in my ways,
And if thou wilt keep my charge,
Then thou shalt also judge my house,
And shalt also keep my courts, [stand by.
And I will give thee places to walk among these that

There was a Joshua that was a principal agent in the first settling of Israel in Canaan. Here is another of the same name very active in their second settlement there after the captivity. Jesus is the same name, and it signifies a saviour; and they were both figures of him that was to come, our Chief Captain and our Chief Priest. The angel that talked with Zechariah shewed him Joshua the high priest; it is likely the prophet saw him frequently, and spoke to him, and there was a great intimacy between them. But in his common views he only saw how he appeared before men; if he must know how he stands before the Lord, it must be shewed him in vision; and so it is shewed him. And so men are really as they are with God, not as they appear in the eye of the world. He stood before the angel of the Lord; that is, before Christ, the Lord of the angels, to whom even the high priests themselves of Aaron's order were accountable. He stood before the angel of the Lord to execute his office, to minister to God under the inspection of the angels. He stood to consult the oracle on the behalf of Israel, whom as high priest he was agent for. Guilt and corruption are our two great discouragements when we stand before God. By the guilt of the sins committed by us we are become obnoxious to the justice of God, by the power of the sin that dwelleth in us we are become odious to the holiness of God. All God's Israel are in danger upon these two accounts. Joshua was so here, for "the law made men priests that had infirmity," Heb. vii. 28; and as to both we have relief from Jesus Christ, who is made of God to us both righteousness and sanctification.

First. Joshua is accused as a criminal, but is justified.

1. A violent opposition is made to him. Satan stands "at his right hand to resist him," to be a Satan to him, a law adversary. He stands at his right hand, as the prosecutor or witness at the right hand of the prisoner. Note, The devil is the accuser of the brethren, that "accuseth them before God day and night," Rev. xii. 10. Some think the chief priest was accused for the sin of many of the inferior priests, in marrying strange wives, which they were much guilty of after their return out of captivity, Ezr. ix. 1, 2; Neh. xiii. 28. When God is about to re-establish the priesthood, Satan objects the sins that were found among the priests, as rendering them unworthy the honour designed them. It is by our own folly that we give Satan advantage against us, and furnish him with matter for reproach and accusation; and if any thing be amiss, especially with the priests, Satan will be sure to aggravate it, and make the worst of it. He stood to resist him; that is, to oppose the service he was doing for the public good. He stood at his right hand, the hand for action, to discourage him, and to raise difficulties in his way. Note, When we stand before God to minister to him, or stand up for God to serve his interests, we must expect to meet with all the resistance that Satan's subtlety and malice can give us. Let us then resist him that resists us, and he shall flee from us.

2. A victorious defence is made for him; ver. 2, "The Lord," that is, the Lord Christ, "said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee." Note, It is the happiness of the saints that the Judge is their friend; the same that they are accused to is their patron and their protector, and an advocate for them, and he will be sure to bring them off. 1st. Satan is here checked by one that has authority, that has conquered him, and many a time silenced him. "The accuser of the brethren," of the ministers and the ministry, is cast out; his indictments quashed, and his suggestions against them, as well as his suggestions to them, shewed to be malicious, frivolous, and vexatious; "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan." "The Lord said," that is, the Lord our Redeemer, "The Lord rebuke thee," that is, the Lord our Creator. The power of God is engaged for the making of the grace of Christ effectual. The Lord restrain thy malicious rage, reject thy malicious charge, and revenge upon thee thine enmity to a servant of his. Note, Those that belong to Christ have him ready to appear vigorously for them, then when Satan appears most vehement against them. He doth not parley with him, but stops his mouth immediately with this sharp reprimand, "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan." This is the best way of dealing with that furious enemy; "Get thee behind me, Satan." 2nd. Satan is here argued with. He resists the priest, but let him know that his resistance, First. Will be fruitless; it will be to no purpose to attempt any thing against Jerusalem, for the Lord hath chosen it, and he will abide by his choice. Whatever is objected against God's people, God saw it; he foresaw it when he chose them, and yet he chose them; and, therefore, that can be no inducement to him now to reject them. He knew the worst of them when he chose them, and his election shall obtain. Secondly. It is unreasonable; for, "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" Joshua is so, and the priesthood, and the people whose representative he is. Christ has not that to say for them for which they are to be praised, but that for which they are to be pitied. Note, Christ is ready to make the best of his people, and takes notice of every thing that is pleadable in excuse of their infirmities, so far is he from being extreme to mark what they do amiss. They have been lately in the fire, no wonder they are black and smoked, and have the smell of the fire upon them, but they are therefore to be excused, not to be accused. One can expect no other but that those who but the other day were captives in Babylon should appear very mean and despicable. They have been lately brought out of great affliction, and is Satan so barbarous as to desire to have them thrown into affliction again? They have been wonderfully delivered out of the fire, that God might be glorified in them; and will he then cast them off, and abandon them? No; he will not quench the smoking flax, because he intended to make use of it. Note, Narrow escapes from imminent danger are happy presages and powerful pleas for more eminent favours. A converted soul is a brand plucked out of the fire by a miracle of free grace, and therefore shall not be left to be a prey to Satan.

Secondly. Joshua appears as one polluted, but is purified; for he represents the Israel of God, who are all as an unclean thing, until they are washed and sanctified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. Now observe here,

1. The impurity wherein Joshua appeared, ver. 3. He was clothed not only in coarse but in filthy garments, such as did very ill become the dignity of his office and the sanctity of his work. By the law of Moses the garments of the high priest were to be for glory, and for beauty, Ex. xxviii. 2; but Joshua's garments were a shame and reproach to him. Yet in them "he stood before the angel of the Lord;" he had no clean linen wherein to minister, and do the duty of his place. Now this intimates not only that the priesthood was poor and despised, and loaded with contempt, but that there was a great deal of iniquity cleaving to the holy things. The returned Jews were so taken up with their troubles, that they thought they needed not to complain of their sins, and were not aware those were the great hindrances of the progress of God's work among them; because they were free from idolatry, they thought themselves chargeable with no iniquity. But God shews them there were many things amiss in them, which retarded the advances of God's favours towards them. There were spiritual enemies warring against them, more dangerous than any of the neighbour nations. The Chaldee paraphrase saith, Joshua had sons, who took unto them wives which were not lawful for the priests to take; and we find it was so, Ezr. x. 18. And, no doubt, there were other things amiss in the priesthood, Mal. ii. 1; yet Joshua was permitted to stand before the angel of the Lord: though his children did not as they should, yet the covenant of priesthood was not broken. Note, Christ bears with his people, whose hearts are upright with him, and admits them into communion with himself, notwithstanding their manifold infirmities.

2. The provision that was made for his cleansing. Christ gave orders to the angels that attended him, and were ready to do his pleasure, to put Joshua into a better state. Joshua presented himself before the Lord in his filthy garments, as an object of his pity; and Christ graciously looked upon him with compassion, and not, as justly he might have done, with indignation. Christ loathed the filthiness of Joshua's garments, yet did not put him away, but put them away. Thus God by his grace doth with those whom he chooses to be priests to himself, he parts between them and their sins, and so prevents their sins parting between them and their God; reconciles himself to the sinner, but not to the sin. Two things are here done for Joshua, representing a double work of Divine grace wrought in and for believers.

1st. His filthy garments are taken from him, ver. 4; the meaning of which is given us in what Christ said, and he said it as one having authority, "Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee." The guilt of it is taken away by pardoning mercy, the stink and stain of it is by peace spoken to the conscience, and the power of it broken by renewing grace. When God forgives our sins he "causeth our iniquity to pass from us," that it may not appear against us to condemn us; it passeth from us as far as the east is from the west. When he sanctifies the nature, he enables us to put off the old man, to cast away from us the filthy rags of our corrupt affections and lusts, as things we will never have any thing more to do with, will never gird to us, or appear in. Thus Christ washeth those from their sins in his own blood whom he makes to our God kings and priests, Rev. i. 5, 6. Either we must be cleansed from the pollutions of sin, or we shall, as polluted, be put from that priesthood, Ezr. ii. 62.

2nd. He is clothed anew, has not only the shame of his filthiness removed, but the shame of his nakedness covered; "I will clothe thee with change of raiment." Joshua had no clean linen of his own, but Christ will provide for him; for he will not let a priesthood of his own instituting be lost, be either contemptible before men or unacceptable before God. The change of raiment here is rich, costly raiment, such as is worn on high days; Joshua shall appear as lovely as ever he appeared loathsome. They that minister in holy things shall not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well. God will make them wise, and humble, and diligent, and faithful, and examples of every thing that is good; and then Joshua is clothed with change of raiment. Thus those whom Christ makes spiritual priests are clothed with the spotless robe of his righteousness, and appear before God in that, and with the graces of his Spirit, which are ornaments to them. The righteousness of saints, both imputed and implanted, is the fine linen, clean and white, with which the bride the Lamb's wife is arrayed, Rev. xix. 8.

Thirdly. Joshua is in danger of being turned out of office, but instead of that he is reinstalled, and established in his office. He not only hath his sins pardoned, and is furnished with grace sufficient for himself, but, as rectus in curia, —'acquitted in court,' he is restored to his former honours and trusts.

1. The crown of the priesthood is put upon him, ver. 5. This was done at the special instance and request of the prophet: "I said, Let them set a fair mitre upon his head," as a badge of his office. Now he looks clean, let him also look great; let him be dressed up in all the garments of the high priest. Note, When God designs the restoring and reviving of religion, he stirs up his prophets and people to pray for it, and doth it in answer to their prayers. Zechariah prayed that the angels might be ordered to set the mitre on Joshua's head, and they did it immediately, and clothed him with the priestly garments; for no man took this honour to himself but he that was called of God to it. "The angel of the Lord stood by," as having the oversight of the work, which the created angels were employed in. He stood by as one well pleased with it, and resolved to stand by the orders he had given for the doing of it, and to continue his presence with that priesthood.

2. The covenant of the priesthood is renewed with him, which is called God's covenant of peace, Num. xxv. 12. Mr. Pemble calls it the patent of his office, which is here declared and delivered to him before witnesses, ver. 6, 7. The angel of the Lord having taken care to make him fit for his office, (and all that God calls to any office he either finds them fit or makes them so,) invests him in it. And though he is not made a priest with an oath, that honour is reserved for him who is a priest after the order of Melchisedek, Heb. vii. 21, yet, being a type of him, he is inaugurated with a solemn declaration of the terms upon which he held his office. The angel of the Lord protested to Joshua that, if he would be sure to do the duty of his place, he should enjoy the dignity and reward of it. Now see,

1st. What the conditions are upon which he enters into his office. Let him know that he is upon his good behaviour; he must walk in God's ways, that is, he must live a good life, and be holy in all manner of conversation; must go before the people in the paths of God's commandments, and walk circumspectly. He must also keep God's charge, must carefully do all the services of the priesthood, and must see to it that the inferior priests perform the duties of their place decently and in order. He must take heed to himself and to all the flock, Acts xx. 28. Note, Good ministers must be good Christians; yet that is not enough: they have a trust committed to them, they are charged with it, and they must keep it with all possible care, that they may give up their account of it with joy, 1 Tim. vi. 14.

2nd. What the privileges are which he may expect and be assured of in the due discharge of his office. His patent runs, quamdiu se bene gesserit,—'during good behaviour;' let him be sure to do his part, and God will own him. First. "Thou shalt judge mine house;" that is, thou shalt preside in the affairs of the temple, and the inferior priests shall be under thy direction. Note, The power of the church and of church rulers is not a legislative, but only a judicial power. The high priest might not make any new laws for God's house, nor ordain any other rights of worship than what God had ordained, but he must judge God's house, that is, he must see to it that God's laws and ordinances were punctually observed; must protect and encourage those that did observe them, and inquire into and punish the violation of them. Secondly. "Thou shalt also keep my courts;" that is, thou shalt have the oversight of what is done in all the courts of the temple, and shalt keep them pure and in good order for the worship to be performed in them. Note, Ministers are God's stewards, and they are to keep his courts in honour of him, who is the chief Lord, and for the preserving of equity and good order among his tenants. Thirdly. "I will give thee places to walk among those that stand by;" that is, among these angels that are inspectors and assistants in this instalment. They shall stand by while Joshua is at work for God, and shall be as a guard to him; or he shall be highly honoured and respected as an angel of God, Gal. iv. 14. Ministers are called angels, Rev. i. 20. They that walk in God's ways may be said to walk among the angels themselves, for they do the will of God, as the angels do it that are in heaven, and are their fellow-servants, Rev. xix. 10. Some make it a promise of eternal life, and of a reward of his fidelity in the future state. Heaven is not only a palace, a place to repose in, but a paradise, a garden, a place to walk in; and there are walks among the angels, in society with that holy and glorious company: Eze. xxviii. 14.

8 Hear now, O Joshua the high priest,
Thou, and thy fellows that sit before thee:
For they are men wondered at:
For, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH.
9 For behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua;
Upon one stone shall be seven eyes:
Behold, I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the LORD of hosts,
And I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day.
10 In that day, saith the LORD of hosts,
Shall ye call every man his neighbour
Under the vine and under the fig tree.

As the promises made to David oft slide insensibly into promises of the Messiah, whose kingdom David's was a type of, so the promises here made to Joshua presently rise as far upward, and look as far forward, as to Christ, whose priesthood Joshua's was now a shadow of, not only in general, as it kept up the line of Aaron's priesthood, but especially as it was the reviving of that happy method of correspondence between heaven and earth, to which a great interruption had been given by the iniquity and captivity of Israel. Christ is a high priest as Joshua was, for sinners and sufferers, to mediate for those that have been under guilt and wrath; and it was fit Joshua should understand the priesthood of Christ, because all the virtue of his priesthood, its value and usefulness to the church, depended upon, and was derived from, the priesthood of Christ. See,

First. To whom this promise of Christ is directed; ver. 8, "Hear now, O Joshua." Thou hast heard with pleasure what belongs to thyself, but behold a greater than Joshua is at hand; hear now concerning him, thou and the rest of the priests, "thy fellows that sit before thee," at thy feet, as learners, but whom thou art to look upon as thy fellows, for all ye are brethren. Let the high priest and all the inferior priests take notice of this, for they are men wondered at. They are set for signs, that is, for types and figures of Christ's priesthood. What God now did for Joshua and his fellows was a happy omen of the coming of the Messiah promised, and would be so interpreted with a pleasing wonder by all that had understanding of the times. Or, they are men wondered at for their singularity, hooted at as strange sort of people, because they run not with others to the same excess of riot, 1 Pet. iv. 4. Or, for their strange afflictions and surprising deliverance out of them, as Ps. lxxi. 7, "I am as a wonder unto many." They are men of wonder; they are a wonder to themselves, are amazed to think how happily their condition is altered. God's people and ministers are, upon many accounts, men wondered at. The high priest and his fellows here, as the prophet and his children, Isa. viii. 18, are for signs and for wonders. But men's wonders at them will cease when the Messiah comes, as the stars are eclipsed by the light of the sun, for his name shall be called Wonderful.

Secondly. The promise itself, which consists of several parts, all designed for the comfort and encouragement of Joshua and his friends in that great good work of building the temple which they were now engaged in. An eye to Christ, and a believing dependence on the promises relating to him and his kingdom, would carry him through the difficulties they met with in that and other their services.

1. The Messiah shall come; "Behold, I will bring forth my servant the Branch." He has been long hid, but the fulness of time is now at hand, when he shall be brought forth into the world, brought forth among his people Israel. God himself undertakes to bring him forth, and therefore no doubt he will own him, and stand by him. He is God's servant, employed in his work, obedient to his will, and entirely devoted to his honour and glory. He is the branch; so he was called Isa. iv. 2, "The branch of the Lord;" Isa. xi. 1, "A branch out of the root of Jesse;" Jer. xxiii. 5, "A righteous branch;" and Jer. xxxiii. 15, "The branch of righteousness," whose beginning was small, as a tender branch, but in time should become a great tree, and fill the earth, Isa. liii. 2. He is the branch from which all our fruit must be gathered.

2. Many eyes shall be upon him. He is the stone laid before Joshua, alluding to the foundation or chief corner-stone of the temple, which probably was laid with great solemnity in the presence of Joshua. Christ is not only the branch, which is the beginning of a tree, but the foundation, which is the beginning of a building, and when he shall be "brought forth seven eyes shall be upon him." The eye of his Father was upon him, to take care of him and protect him, especially in his sufferings; when he was buried in the grave, as the foundation stones are under ground, yet the eyes of heaven were upon him; buried out of men's sight, but not out of God's. The eyes of all the prophets and Old Testament saints were upon this one stone. Abraham rejoiced to see Christ's day, and he "saw it, and was glad." The eyes of all believers are upon him; they look unto him and are saved, as the eyes of the stung Israelites were upon the brazen serpent. Some understand this one stone to have the seven eyes in it, as the wheels had in Ezekiel's vision, and think it denotes that perfection of wisdom and knowledge which Jesus Christ was endued with for the good of his church; "His eyes run to and fro through the earth."

3. God himself will beautify him, and put honour upon him. "I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts." This stone the builders refused, as rough and unsightly, but God undertakes to smooth and polish it; nay, and to carve it, so as that it shall be "the head stone of the corner," the most beautiful in all the building. Christ was God's workmanship, and abundance of his wisdom appears in the contrivance of our redemption, which will appear when the engraving is perfected. This stone is a precious stone, though laid for the foundation, and the graving of it seems to allude to the precious stones in the breastplate of the high priest, which had the names of the tribes graven upon them, as the engraving of a signet, Ex. xxviii. 21, 22. In that breastplate there were twelve stones laid before Aaron; for aught appears those were lost. But there shall be one worth them all laid before Joshua, and that is Christ himself. This precious stone shall sparkle as if it had seven eyes; there shall appear a perfection of wisdom and prudence in the oracles that proceed from this breastplate of judgment. And God will "engrave the graving thereof;" he will intrust Christ with all his elect, and he shall appear as their representative and agent for them, as the high priest did when he went in before the Lord, with the names of all Israel engraven in the precious stones of his breastplate. When God gave a remnant to Christ, to be brought through grace to glory, then he engraved the graving of this precious stone.

4. By him sin shall be taken away, both the guilt and the dominion of it. "I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day." When the high priest had the names of Israel engraven on the precious stones he was adorned with, he is said to "bear the iniquity of the holy things," Ex. xxviii. 38; but "the law made nothing perfect," Heb. x. 1. He bore the iniquity of the land as a type of Christ, but he could not remove it; the doing of that was reserved for Christ, that blessed "Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world;" and he did it in one day, that day in which he suffered and died. That was done by the sacrifice offered that day, which could not be done by the sacrifices of ages before; no, not by all the days of atonement which from Moses to Christ returned every year. This agrees with the angel's prediction, Dan. ix. 24: he shall finish transgression, and make an end of sin. And some make the engravings wherewith God engraved him to signify the wounds and stripes which were given to his blessed body, which he underwent for our transgression, for our iniquity, and by which we are healed.

5. The effect of all this shall be the sweet enjoyment which all believers shall have of themselves, and the sweet communion they shall have with one another; ver. 10, "In that day ye shall call every man his neighbour under the vine and the fig-tree," which yield most pleasant fruit, and whose leaves also afford a refreshing shade for arbours. When iniquity is taken away, 1st. We reap precious benefits and privileges from our justification, more precious than the products of the vine or the fig-tree, Rom. v. 1. 2nd. We repose ourselves in a sweet tranquillity, and are quiet from the fear of evil. What should terrify us when iniquity is taken away, when nothing can hurt us? We sit down under Christ's shadow with delight, and by it are sheltered from the scorching heat of the curse of the law. We live as Israel in the peaceable reign of Solomon, 1 Kin. iv. 24, 25, for he is the Prince of peace. 3rd. We ought to invite others to come and partake with us in the enjoyment of these privileges, to "call every man his neighbour" to come and sit with him for mutual converse under the vine and fig-tree, and to share with him in the fruits he is surrounded with. Gospel grace, as far as it comes with power, makes men neighbourly; and those that have the comfort of acquaintance with Christ themselves, and communion with God through him, will be forward to court others to it; "Let us go unto the house of the Lord."

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter we have another comfortable vision, which, as it was explained to the prophet, had much in it for the encouragement of the people of God in their present straits, which were so great that they thought their case helpless, that their temple could never be rebuilt, nor their city replenished; and therefore the scope of the vision is to shew that God would by his own power perfect the work, though the assistance given to it by his own friends were never so weak, and the resistance given to it by its enemies were never so strong. Here is, I. The awakening of the prophet to observe the vision, ver. 1. II. The vision itself, of a candlestick with seven lamps, which were supplied with oil, and kept burning, immediately from two olive trees that grew by it, one on either side, ver. 2, 3. III. The general encouragement hereby intended to be given to the builders of the temple to go on in that good work, assuring them that it should be brought to perfection at last, ver. 4—10. IV. The particular explication of the vision, for the illustration of these assurances, ver. 11—14.

AND the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep, 2 And said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which are upon the top thereof: 3 And two olive trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl, and the other upon the left side thereof. 4 So I answered and spake to the angel that talked with me, saying, What are these, my lord? 5 Then the angel that talked with me answered and said unto me, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord. 6 Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, This is the word of the LORD unto Zerubbabel, saying,

Not by might, nor by power,
But by my spirit, saith the LORD of hosts.

7 Who art thou, O great mountain?
Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain:
And he shall bring forth the headstone thereof
With shoutings, crying, Grace, grace unto it!

8 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 9 The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall also finish it; and thou shalt know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto you. 10 For who hath despised the day of small things? for they shall rejoice, and shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel with those seven; they are the eyes of the LORD, which run to and fro through the whole earth.

Here is, First. The prophet prepared to receive the discovery that was to be made him; "The angel that talked with me came and waked me," ver. 1. It seems, though he was in conference with an angel, and about matters of great and public concern, yet he grew dull, and was dropped asleep, as it should seem, while the angel was yet talking with him. Thus the disciples, when they saw Christ transfigured, were heavy with sleep, Lu. ix. 32. The prophet's spirit, no doubt, was willing to have attended to that which was to be seen and heard, but the flesh was weak; his body could not keep pace with his soul in Divine contemplations; the strangeness of the vision perhaps stupified him, and so he was overcome with sleep; or perhaps the sweetness of the vision composed him, and even sung him asleep. Daniel was in a deep "sleep when he heard the voice of the angel's words," Dan. x. 9. We shall never be fit for converse with spirits till we are got clear of these bodies of flesh." It should seem the angel let him lose himself a little, that he might be fresh to receive new discoveries, but then waked him, to his surprise, "as a man that is wakened out of his sleep." Note, We need the Spirit of God not only to make known to us Divine things, but to make us take notice of them; "He wakens morning by morning, he wakens mine ear," Isa. l. 4. We should beg of God that whenever he speaks to us he would waken us, and we should then stir up ourselves.

Secondly. The discovery that was made to him when he was thus prepared. The angel asked him, "What seest thou?" ver. 2. When he was awake, perhaps, he had not taken notice of what was presented to his view, if he had not thus been excited to look about him. When he observed, he saw a golden candlestick, such an one as was in the temple formerly, and with the like this temple should in due time be furnished. The church is a candlestick, set up for the enlightening this dark world, and the holding forth of the light of Divine revelation to it. The candle is God's, the church is but the candlestick, but all of gold, noting the great worth and excellency of the church of God. This golden candlestick had seven lamps branching out from it, so many sockets, in each of which was a burning and shining light. The Jewish church was but one; and the Jews that were dispersed, it is probable, had synagogues in other countries, yet they were but as so many lamps, belonging to one candlestick. But now, under the Gospel, Christ is the centre of unity, and not Jerusalem, or any one place; and therefore seven particular churches are represented, not as seven lamps, but as seven several golden candlesticks, Rev. i. 20. This candlestick had one bowl, or common receiver, on the top, into which oil was continually dropping, and from it, by seven secret pipes or passages, it was diffused to the seven lamps, so that without any farther care they received oil as fast as they wasted it, (as in those which we call fountain inkhorns or fountain pens,) never wanted, nor were ever glutted, and so kept always burning clear. And the bowl, too, was continually supplied, without any care or attendance of man; for, ver. 3, he saw two olive trees, one on each side the candlestick, that were so fat and fruitful that of their own accord they poured plenty of oil continually into the bowl, which by two large pipes, ver. 12, dispersed the oil to lesser ones, and so to the lamps; so that nobody needed to attend this candlestick, to furnish it with oil,—it "tarried not for man, nor waited for the sons of men;" the scope of which is to shew that God easily can, and often doth, accomplish his gracious purposes concerning his church by his own wisdom and power, without any art or labour of man. And though sometimes he makes use of instruments, yet he neither needs them nor is tied to them, but can do his work without them, and will rather than it shall be undone.

Thirdly. The inquiry which the prophet made concerning the meaning of this, and the gentle reproof given him for his dulness; ver. 4, "I answered and spake to the angel, saying, What are these, my lord?" Observe how respectfully he speaks to the angel; he called him, "my lord." Those that would be taught must give honour to their teachers; he saw what these were, but asked what these signified. Note, It is very desirable to know the meaning of God's manifestations of himself and his mind, both in his word and by his ordinances and providences. What mean ye by these services, by these signs? And those that would understand the mind of God must be inquisitive; then shall we know, if we follow on to know, if we not only hear, but, as Christ, ask questions upon what we hear, Lu. ii. 46. The angel answered him with a question, "Knowest thou not what these be?" intimating that, if he had considered and compared spiritual things with spiritual, he might have guessed at the meaning of these things; for he knew that there was a golden candlestick in the tabernacle, which it was the priests' constant business to supply with oil, and to keep it burning for the use of the tabernacle. When, therefore, he saw in vision such a candlestick, with lamps always kept burning, and yet no priests to attend it, nor any occasion for them, he might discern the meaning of this to be that, though God had set up the priesthood again, yet he could carry on his own work for and in his people without them. Note, We have reason to be ashamed of ourselves that we do not more readily apprehend the meaning of Divine discoveries. The angel asked the prophet this question, to draw from him an acknowledgment of his own dulness, and darkness, and slowness to understand, and he had it presently; "I said, No, my lord," I know not what these be. Visions had their significancy, but often dark and hard to be understood, and the prophets themselves were not always aware of it at first. But those that would be taught of God must see and acknowledge their own ignorance and their need to be taught, and must apply themselves to God for instruction. To him that gave us the cabinet we must apply ourselves for the key wherewith to unlock it. God will teach the meek and humble, not those who are conceited of themselves, and lean on the broken reed of their own understanding.

Fourthly. The general intendment of this vision. Without a critical descant upon every circumstance of the vision, the design of it is to assure the prophet, and by him the people, that this good work of building the temple should by the special care of the Divine providence, and the immediate influence of the Divine grace, be brought to a happy issue, though the enemies of it were many and mighty, and the friends and furtherers of it few and feeble. Note, In the explication of visions and parables we must look at the principal scope of them, and be satisfied with that, if that be clear, though we may not be able to account for every circumstance, or accommodate it to our purpose. The angel lets the prophet know, in general, that this vision was designed to illustrate a word which the Lord had to say to Zerubbabel, to encourage him to go on with the building of the temple. Let him know that he is a worker together with God in it, and it is a work which God will own and crown.

1. God will carry on and complete this work, as he had begun their deliverance from Babylon, not by external force, but by secret operations and internal influences upon the minds of men. He saith this who is the Lord of hosts, and could do it vi et armis,—'by force,' has legions at command; but he will do it, not by human might or power, but by his own Spirit. What is done by his Spirit is done by might and power, but it stands in opposition to visible force. Israel was brought out of Egypt, and into Canaan, by might and power, in both these works of wonder great slaughter was made; but they were brought out of Babylon, and into Canaan the second time, "by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts," working upon the spirit of Cyrus, and inclining him to proclaim liberty to them, and working upon the spirits of the captives, and inclining them to accept the liberty offered them. It was "by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts" that the people were excited and animated to build the temple, and therefore they are said to be helped by the prophets of God, because they, as the Spirit's mouth, spoke to their hearts, Ezr. v. 2. It was by the same spirit that the heart of Darius was inclined to favour and further that good work, and that the sworn enemies of it were infatuated in their councils, so that they could not hinder it as they designed. Note, The work of God is often carried on very successfully when yet it is carried on very silently, and without the assistance of human force. The gospel temple is built, not by might or power, for "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal," but by "the Spirit of the Lord of hosts," whose work on men's consciences is mighty to the pulling down of strongholds; thus the excellency of the power is of God, and not of man. When instruments fail, let us therefore leave it to God to do his work himself by his own Spirit.

2. All the difficulties and oppositions that lie in the way shall be got over and removed, even those that seem insuperable; ver. 7, "Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain." See here, 1. How the difficulty is represented. It is a great mountain, impassable and immoveable; a heap of rubbish, like a great mountain, which must be got away or the work cannot go on. The enemies of the Jews are proud and hard as great mountains; but when God has work to do, the mountains that stand in the way of it shall dwindle into mole hills; for see here, 2. How these difficulties are despised, "Who art thou, O great mountain," that thou shouldest stand in God's way, and think to stop the progress of his work? who art thou that lookest so big, that thus threatens, and art thus feared? "Before Zerubbabel," when he is God's agent, "thou shalt become a plain." All the difficulties shall vanish, and all the objections be got over; "every mountain and hill" shall be "brought low," when the way of the Lord is to be prepared, Isa. xl. 4. Faith will remove mountains, and make them plains. Christ is our Zerubbabel; mountains of difficulty were in the way of his undertaking, but before him they were all levelled; nothing is too hard for his grace to do.

3. The same hand that has begun this good work will perform it. "He shall bring forth the headstone," ver. 7; and again, ver. 9, "The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundations of this house." Be it spoken to his honour; perhaps with his own hands he laid the first stone; and though it has been long retarded, and is still much opposed, yet it shall be finished at last. He shall live to see it finished, nay, and "his hands shall finish it,"—herein a type of Christ, who is both the author and the finisher of our faith; and his being the author of it is an assurance to us that he will be the finisher; for as for God his work is perfect,—has he begun, and shall he not make an end? Zerubbabel shall himself bring forth the headstone with shoutings and loud acclamations of joy among the spectators. The acclamations are not huzzas, but "Grace, grace;" that is the burden of the triumphant song the church sings. It may be taken, 1. As magnifying free grace, and giving to that all the glory of what is done. When the work is finished, it must be thankfully acknowledged it was not by any policy or power of our own that it was brought to perfection, but it was grace that did it—God's goodwill towards us, and his good work in us and for us. "Grace, grace," must be cried not only to the headstone, but to the foundation-stone, the corner-stone, and indeed to every stone in God's building; from first to last it is nothing of works, but all of grace, and all our crowns must be cast at the feet of free grace. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us." 2. As depending upon free grace, and desiring the continuance of it for what is yet to be done. Grace, grace, is the language of prayer as well as of praise. Now this building is finished, all happiness attend it! Peace be within its walls, and, in order to that, grace. Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon it! Note, What comes from the grace of God may in faith and upon good grounds be committed to the grace of God, for God will not forsake the work of his own hands.

4. This shall be a full ratification of the prophecies which went before concerning the Jews' return, and their settlement again. When the temple is finished, then "thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you." Note, The exact accomplishment of Scripture prophecies is a convincing proof of their Divine original. Thus God "confirmeth the word of his servants by saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built," Isa. xliv. 26. No word of God shall fall to the ground, nor shall there fail one iota or tittle of it; Zechariah's prophecies of the approaching day of deliverance to the church would soon appear by the accomplishment of them to be of God.

5. This shall effectually silence those that looked with contempt upon the beginnings of this work, ver. 10. Who, where, is he now that despised the day of small things, and thought this work would never come to any thing? The Jews themselves despised the foundations of the second temple, because it was likely to be so far inferior to the first, Ezr. iii. 12. Their enemies despised the wall when it was in the building, Neh. ii. 19; iv. 2, 3; but let them not do it. Note, In God's work the day of small things is not to be despised. Though the instruments be weak and unlikely, God often chooseth such by them to bring about great things. As a great mountain becomes a plain before him when he pleaseth, so a little stone cut out of a mountain without hands comes to fill the earth, Dan. ii. 35. Though the beginnings be small, God can make the latter end greatly to increase; a grain of mustard seed may become a great tree. Let not the dawning light be despised, for it will shine more and more to the perfect day. The day of small things is the day of precious things, and will be the day of great things.

6. This shall abundantly satisfy all the hearty well-wishers to God's interest, who will be glad to see themselves mistaken in "despising the day of small things." They that despaired of the finishing of the work shall rejoice when they "see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel;" when they see him busy among the builders, giving orders and directions what to do, and taking care that the work be done with great exactness, that it may be both fine and firm. Note, It is matter of great rejoicing to all good people to see magistrates careful and active for the edifying of the house of God, to see the plummet in the hand of those who have power to do much, if they have but a heart according to it. We see not Zerubbabel with the trowel in his hand,—that is left to the workmen, the ministers; but we see him with the plummet in his hand, and it is no disparagement, but an honour to him. Magistrates are to inspect ministers' work, and to speak comfortably to the Levites that do their duty.

7. This shall highly magnify the wisdom and care of God's providence, which is always employed for the good of his church. Zerubbabel doth his part, doth as much as man can do to forward the work, but it is "with those seven, those seven eyes of the Lord," which we read of, ch. iii. 9. He could do nothing if the watchful, powerful, gracious providence of God did not go before him, and go along with him in it. Except the Lord had built this house, Zerubbabel and the rest had laboured in vain, Ps. cxxvii. 1. These "eyes of the Lord" are they that "run to and fro through the whole earth," that take cognizance of all the creatures and all their actions, 2 Chr. xvi. 9; and inspire and direct all according to the Divine counsels. Note, We must not think that God is so taken up with the affairs of his church as to neglect the world; but it is a comfort to us that the same all-wise almighty Providence that governs the nations of the earth is in a particular manner conversant about the church. Those seven eyes that run through the earth are all upon the stone that Zerubbabel is laying straight with his plummet, to see that it be well laid; and those that have the plummet in their hand must look up to those eyes of the Lord, must have a constant regard to the Divine providence, and act in dependence upon its conduct and submission to its disposals.

11 Then answered I, and said unto him, What are these two olive trees upon the right side of the candlestick and upon the left side thereof? 12 And I answered again, and said unto him, What be these two olive branches which through the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves? 13 And he answered me and said, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord. 14 Then said he, These are the two anointed ones, that stand by the Lord of the whole earth.

Enough is said to Zechariah to encourage him, and to enable him to encourage others, with reference to the good work of building the temple which they were now about, and that was the principal intention of the vision he saw; but still he is inquisitive about the particulars, which we will ascribe, not to any vain curiosity, but to the value he had for Divine discoveries, and the pleasure he took in acquainting himself with them. Those that know much of the things of God cannot but have an humble desire to know more. Now observe,

First. What his inquiry was. He understood the meaning of the candlestick and its lamps,—it is Jerusalem, it is the temple, and their salvation that is to go forth as a lamp that burneth; but he wants to know what are these two olive trees, ver. 11; these two olive branches, ver. 12. Observe here, 1. He asked. Note, Those that would be acquainted with the things of God must be inquisitive concerning those things. Ask and you shall be told. 2. He asked twice, his first question having no reply given to it. Note, If satisfactory answers be not given to our inquiries and requests quickly, we must renew them, and repeat them, and continue instant and importunate in them, and the vision shall at length speak, and not lie. 3. His second query varied somewhat from the former. He first asked, "What are these two olive trees?" but afterwards, "What be these two olive branches?" those boughs of the tree that hung over the bowl, and distilled oil into it. When we inquire concerning the grace of God, it must be rather as it is communicated to us by the fruitful boughs of the word and ordinances, for that is one of the things revealed which belong to us and to our children, than as it is resident in the good olive, where all our springs are, for that is one of the secret things which belong not to us. 4. In his inquiry he mentions the observations he had made upon the vision. He took notice not only of what was obvious at first sight, that the two olive trees grew one on the right side and the other on the left side of the candlestick—so nigh, so ready, is the Divine grace to the church—but he observed farther, upon a more narrow inspection, that the two olive branches from which in particular the candlestick did receive of the root and fatness of the olive, (as the apostle saith of the church, Rom. xi. 17,) did empty the golden oil, that is, the clear bright oil, the best of its kind, and of great value, as if it were aurum potabile,—'liquid gold,' out of themselves through the two golden pipes. Or, as the margin reads it, which, 'by the hand of the two golden pipes empty out of themselves oil into the gold,' that is, into the golden bowl on the head of the candlestick. Our Lord Jesus emptied himself to fill us; his precious blood is the golden oil in which we are supplied with all we need.

Secondly. What answer was given to his inquiry. Now again the angel obliged him expressly to own his ignorance, before he informed him; ver. 13, "Knowest thou not what these be?" If thou knowest the church to be the candlestick, canst thou think the olive trees that supply it with oil to be any other than the grace of God? But he owned he either did not fully understand it or was afraid he did not rightly understand it, "I said, No, my Lord, how should I except some one guide me?" and then he told him, ver. 14, "These are the two sons of oil," so it is in the original, 'the two anointed ones,' so we read it; rather, 'the two oily ones.' That which we read, Isa. v. 1, a very fruitful hill is in the original the horn of the son of oil, a fat and fattening soil. 1. If by the candlestick we understand the visible church, particularly that of the Jews at that time, for whose comfort it was primarily intended, these sons of oil, that stand before the Lord of the whole earth, are the two great ordinances and offices of the magistracy and ministry, at that time lodged in the hands of those two great and good men, Zerubbabel and Joshua. Kings and princes were anointed; this prince, this priest, were oily ones, endued with the gifts and graces of God's Spirit, to qualify them for the work to which they were called. They stood before the Lord of the whole earth, to minister to him, and to receive direction from him; and a great influence they had upon the affairs of the church at that time. Their wisdom, courage, and zeal, were continually emptying themselves into the golden bowl, to keep the lamps burning; and when they are gone others shall be raised up to carry on the same work. Israel shall no longer be without prince and priest. Good magistrates and good ministers, that are themselves anointed with the grace of God, and "stand by the Lord of the whole earth," as faithful adherents to his cause, contribute very much to the maintaining and advancing of religion, and the shining forth of the word of life. 2. If by the candlestick we understand the church of the firstborn of true believers, these sons of oil may be meant of Christ and the Spirit, the Redeemer and the Comforter. Christ is not only the Messiah, the Anointed One himself, but he is the good olive to his church, and "from his fulness we receive," Jno. i. 16; and the Holy Spirit is the unction or anointing which we have received, 1 Jno. ii. 20, 27. From Christ the olive tree, by the Spirit the olive branch, all the golden oil of grace is communicated to believers, which keeps their lamps burning, and without a constant supply of which they would soon go out. They "stand by the Lord of the whole earth," who is in a special manner the church's Lord; for the Son was to be sent by the Father, and so was the Holy Ghost, in the time appointed, and they stand by him ready to go.

CHAPTER V.

Hitherto we have seen visions of peace only, and all the words we have heard have been good words and comfortable words. But the pillar of cloud and fire hath a black and dark side towards the Egyptians, as well as a bright and pleasant side towards Israel. So have Zechariah's visions; for God's prophets are not only his ambassadors to treat of peace with the sons of peace, but heralds to proclaim war against those that delight in war, and persist in their rebellion. Two visions here are in this chapter, by which the "wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." God will do great things for his people, and very kind ones which the faithful sons of Zion shall rejoice in, but let the sinners in Zion be afraid; for, I. God will reckon severely with those particular persons among them that were wicked and profane, and hated to be reformed in these times of reformation; while God is shewing kindness to the body of the nation, and loading that with his blessings, they and their families shall, notwithstanding that, lie under the curse, which the prophet sees in a flying roll, ver. 1—4. II. If the body of the nation hereafter degenerate, and wickedness prevails among them, it shall be carried off and hurried away with a swift destruction, under the pressing weight of Divine wrath, represented by a talent of lead upon the mouth of an ephah, carried upon the wing I know not where, ver. 5—11.

THEN I turned, and lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold a flying roll. 2 And he said unto me, What seest thou? And I answered, I see a flying roll; the length thereof is twenty cubits, and the breadth thereof ten cubits. 3 Then said he unto me,

This is the curse that goeth forth
Over the face of the whole earth:
For every one that stealeth shall be cut off
As on this side according to it;
And every one that sweareth shall be cut off
As on that side according to it.

4 I will bring it forth, saith the LORD of hosts,
And it shall enter into the house of the thief,

And into the house of him that sweareth falsely by my name:
And it shall remain in the midst of his house,
And shall consume it
With the timber thereof and the stones thereof.

We do not find that the prophet now needed to be wakened, as he did, ch. iv. 1; being wakened then, he kept wakeful after; nay, now he needs not be so much as called to look about him, for of his own accord he turns and lifts up his eyes. This good men sometimes get by their infirmities, they make them the more careful and circumspect afterwards. Now observe,

First. What it was that the prophet saw. He looked up into the air, and, "behold, a flying roll," a vast large scroll of parchment, which had been rolled up, and is therefore called a roll, but was now unrolled and expanded. This roll was flying upon the wings of the wind, carried swiftly through the air in open view, as an eagle shoots down upon her prey. It is a roll like Ezekiel's, that was "written within and without with lamentations, and mourning, and woe," Eze. ii. 9, 10. As the command of the law is in writing, for certainty and perpetuity, so is the curse of the law,—it writes bitter things against the sinner: "What I have written I have written," and what is written remains. The angel, to engage the prophet's attention, and to raise in him a desire to have it explained, asks him what he sees; and he gives him this account of it, "I see a flying roll, and" (as near as he can guess by his eye,) it is twenty cubits long," (that is, ten yards,) "and ten cubits broad," (that is, five yards). The Scriptures of the Old Testament and the New are rolls in which God hath written to us the great things of his law and Gospel. Christ is the Master of these rolls; they are large rolls, have much in them; they are flying rolls,—the angel that had "the everlasting Gospel to preach flew in the midst of heaven," Rev. xiv. 6. God's word "runneth very swiftly," Ps. cxlvii. 15. Those that would be let into the meaning of these rolls must first tell what they see, must go as far as they can themselves; "What is written in the law? how readest thou?" Tell me that, and then thou shalt be made to understand what thou readest.

Secondly. How it was expounded to him, ver. 3, 4. This flying roll is a curse; it contains a declaration of the righteous wrath of God against those sinners especially who by swearing affront God's majesty, or by stealing invade their neighbour's property. Let every Israelite rejoice in the blessings of his country with trembling; for if he swear, if he steal, if he live in any course of sin, he shall see them with his eyes, but shall not have the comfort of them, for against him the curse is gone forth; "If I be wicked, woe to me" for all this. Now observe here,

1. The extent of this curse. The prophet sees it flying, but which way doth it steer its course? It "goes forth over the face of the whole earth," not only of the land of Israel, but the whole world; for those that have sinned against the law written in their hearts only shall by that law be judged, though they have not the book of the law. Note, All mankind are liable to the judgment of God; and wherever sinners are, any where upon the face of the whole earth, the curse of God can and will find them out, and seize them. Oh that we could with an eye of faith see the flying roll of God's curse hanging over the guilty world as a thick cloud, not only keeping off the sunbeams of God's favour from them, but big with thunders, lightnings, and storms, ready to destroy them! How welcome then would the tidings of a Saviour be, who came to redeem us from the curse of the law, by being himself made a curse for us, and like the prophet eating this roll! The vast length and breadth of this roll intimates what a multitude of curses sinners lie exposed to. God will make their plagues wonderful, if they turn not.

2. The criminals against whom particularly this curse is levelled. The world is full of sin, in great variety, so was the Jewish church at this time; but two sorts of sinners are here specified as the objects of this curse. 1st. Thieves. It is "for every one that stealeth," that by fraud or force takes that which is not his own, especially that robs God, and converts to his own use what was devoted to God and his honour, which was a sin much complained of among the Jews at this time, Mal. iii. 8; Neh. xiii. 10. Sacrilege is, without doubt, the worst kind of thievery. He also that "robs his father or mother, and saith it is no transgression," Pr. xxviii. 24, let him know that against him this curse is directed, for it is against every one that stealeth. The letter of the eighth commandment hath no penalty annexed to it, but the curse here is a sanction to that command. 2nd. Swearers. The former sin against the second table, these against the first; for the curse meets those that break either table. He that swears rashly and profanely shall not be held guiltless, much less he that swears falsely, ver. 4; he imprecates the curse upon himself by his perjury—so shall his doom be. God will say, Amen to his imprecation, and turn it upon his own head. He has appealed to God's judgment, which is always according to truth, for the confirming of a lie, and to that judgment he shall go which he hath so impiously affronted.

3. The enforcing of this curse, and the equity of it; "I will bring it forth, saith the Lord of hosts," ver. 4. He that pronounces the sentence will take care to see it executed. His bringing it forth notes, 1st. His giving it commission. It is a righteous curse, for he is a righteous God that warrants it. 2nd. His giving it the setting on. He brings it forth with power, and orders what execution it shall do; and who can put by or resist the curse which a God of almighty power brings forth?

4. The effect of this curse. It is very dreadful, 1st. Upon the sinner himself; "Every one that steals shall be cut off;" not corrected, but destroyed,—cut off from the land of the living. The curse of God is a cutting thing, a killing thing. He shall be cut off as on this side, cut off from this place, that is, from Jerusalem; and so he that swears from this side, (it is the same word,) from this place. God will not spare the sinners he finds among his own people, nor shall the holy city be a protection to the unholy. Or, they shall be cut off from hence, that is, from the face of the whole earth, over which the curse flies. Or, he that steals shall be cut off on this side, and he that swears "on that side," that is, they shall be cut off, one as well as another, and both according to the curse; for the judgments of God's hand are exactly agreeable with the judgments of his mouth. 2nd. Upon his family. It shall enter into the house of the thief, and him that swears. God's curse comes with a warrant to break open doors, and cannot be kept out by bars or locks. There, where the sinner is most secure, and thinks himself out of danger,—there, where he promiseth himself refreshment by food and sleep,—there, in his own house, shall the curse of God seize him; nay, it shall fall, not upon him only, but upon all about him, for his sake: "Cursed shall be his basket and his store, and cursed the fruit of his body," Deu. xxviii. 17, 18. "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked," Pr. iii. 33. It shall not only beset his house, or lie at the door, but "it shall remain in the midst of his house," and diffuse its malignant influences to all the parts of it; "it shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his," Job xviii. 15. It shall dwell where he dwells, and be his constant companion at bed and board, to make both miserable to him. Having got possession it shall keep it; and unless he repent and reform there is no way to throw it out, or cut off the entail of it. Nay, it shall so remain in it as to "consume it with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof," which, though never so strong, though the timber be heart of oak, and the stones hewn out of the rocks of adamant, yet they shall not be able to stand before the curse of God. We heard the stone and timber complaining of the owner's extortion and oppression, and groaning under the burden of it, Hab. ii. 11; now here we have them delivered from that bondage of corruption. While they were in their strength and beauty they supported (sore against their will) the sinner's pride and security, but when they are consumed their ruins will (to their satisfaction) be standing monuments of God's justice, and lasting witnesses of the sinner's injustice. Note, Sin is the ruin of houses and families, especially the sins of injury and perjury. "Who knows the power of God's anger," and the operations of his curse? Even timber and stones have been consumed by them; let us therefore stand in awe, and not sin.

5 Then the angel that talked with me went forth, and said unto me, Lift up now thine eyes, and see what is this that goeth forth. 6 And I said, What is it? And he said, This is an ephah that goeth forth. He said moreover, This is their resemblance through all the earth. 7 And, behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead: and this is a woman that sitteth in the midst of the ephah. 8 And he said, This is wickedness. And he cast it into the midst of the ephah; and he cast the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof. 9 Then lifted I up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came out two women, and the wind was in their wings; for they had wings like the wings of a stork: and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven. 10 Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah? 11 And he said unto me, To build it an house in the land of Shinar: and it shall be established, and set there upon her own base.

The foregoing vision was very plain and easy, but in this are things dark and hard to be understood, and some think that the scope of it is to foretell the final destruction of the Jewish church and nation, and the dispersion of the Jews, when, by crucifying Christ and persecuting his Gospel, they should have filled up the measure of their iniquities; therefore it is industriously set out in obscure figures and expressions, 'lest the plain denunciation of the second overthrow of temple and state might discourage them too much from going forward in the restoration of both.' See Mr. Pemble.

The prophet was contemplating the power and terror of the curse, which consumes the houses of thieves and swearers, when he is bid to turn, and he shall see greater desolations than these made by the curse of God, for the sin of man. "Lift up thine eyes now," and see what is here, ver. 5, "what is this that goeth forth." Whether over the face of the whole earth, as the flying roll, ver. 3, or only over Jerusalem, is not certain; but it seems the prophet now, either through the distance or the dimness of his sight, could not well tell what it was, but asked, "What is it?" ver. 6, and the angel tells him both what it is and what it means.

First. He sees an ephah, a measure wherewith they measured corn; it contained ten omers, Ex. xvi. 36, and was the tenth part of an homer, Eze. xlv. 11; it is put for any measure used in commerce, Deu. xxv. 14. And "this is their resemblance," that is, the resemblance of the Jewish nation over all the earth, wherever they are dispersed; or at least it will be so when their ruin draws near. They are filling up the measure of their iniquity, which God hath set them; and when it is full, as the ephah of corn, they shall be delivered into the hands of those to whom God has sold them for their sins. They are meted to destruction, as an ephah of corn measured to the market, or to the mill. Some think the mentioning of an ephah, which is used in buying and selling, intimates that fraud, and deceit, and extortion in commerce, were sins abounding much among them, as that people are known to be notoriously guilty of them at this day. This is a proper representation of them through all the earth. There is a measure set them, and they are filling it up apace: see Mat. xxiii. 32; 1 Thes. ii. 16.

Secondly. He sees "a woman sitting in the midst of the ephah," representing the sinful church and nation of the Jews, in their later and degenerate age, when the faithful city became a harlot. He that weighs the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance, measures nations and churches as in an ephah, so exact is he in his judicial dealings with them. God's people are called the corn of his floor, Isa. xxi. 10; and here he puts this corn into the bushel, in order to his parting with it. The angel saith of the woman in the ephah, "This is wickedness;" it is a wicked nation, else God would not have rejected it thus; it is as wicked as wickedness itself; it is abominably wicked. "How is the gold become dim!" Israel "was holiness to the Lord," Jer. ii. 3; but now, "This is wickedness;" and wickedness is nowhere so scandalous, so odious, and many times so outrageous, as when it is found among professors of religion.

3. He sees the woman thrust down into the ephah, and a talent, or large weight, of lead, cast upon the mouth of it, by which she is secured, and made a close prisoner in the ephah, and utterly disabled to get out of it. This is designed to shew that the wrath of God against impenitent sinners is, 1. Unavoidable, and what they cannot escape. They are bound over to it, concluded under sin, and shut up under the curse, as this woman in the ephah; "He would fain flee out of his hand," Job xxvii. 22, but he cannot. 2. It is insupportable, and what they cannot bear up under. Guilt is upon the sinner as a talent of lead, to sink him to the lowest hell. When Christ said of the things of Jerusalem's peace, "Now they are hid from thine eyes," that threw a talent of lead upon them.

Fourthly. He sees the ephah, with the woman thus pressed to death in it, carried away into some far country. 1. The instruments employed to do it were two women, that had wings like those of a stork, large and strong; and, to make them fly the more swiftly, they had the "wind in their wings," noting the great violence and expedition with which the Romans destroyed the Jewish nation. God has not only winged messengers in heaven, but he can when he pleases give wings to those also whom he employs in this lower world; and when he doth so he forwards them with the wind in their wings—his providence carries them on with a favourable gale. 2. They bore it up in the air, noting the terrors which pursued the wicked Jews, and their being a public example of God's vengeance to the world. They lift it up between the earth and the heaven, as unworthy of either, and abandoned by both; for the Jews, when this was fulfilled, pleased not God, and were contrary to all men, 1 Thes. ii. 15. This is wickedness, and this comes of it: heaven thrust out wicked angels, and earth spewed out wicked Canaanites. 3. When the prophet inquired whither they carried their prisoner, whom they had now in execution, (ver. 10,) he was told they designed to "build it a house in the land of Shinar," which intimates that the punishment of the Jews should be a final dispersion; they should be hurried out of their own country, as the chaff which the wind driveth away, and should be forced to dwell in far countries, particularly in the country of Babylon, whither many of the scattered Jews went after the destruction of their country by the Romans, as they did also to other countries, especially in the Levant parts; not to sojourn, as in their former captivity, for seventy years, but to be nailed down for perpetuity. There the ephah shall "be established, and set upon her own base," which intimates, 1st. That their calamity shall continue from generation to generation, and they shall be so dispersed that they shall never unite or incorporate again; they shall settle in a perpetual unsettlement, and Cain's doom shall be theirs, to dwell in the land of shaking. 2nd. That their iniquity shall continue too, and their hearts shall be hardened in it. Blindness is happened unto Israel, and they are settled upon the lees of their own unbelief; their wickedness is established on its own basis. God has given them a spirit of slumber, Rom. xi. 8, lest at any time they should convert and be healed.

CHAPTER VI.

The two kingdoms of providence and grace are what we are all very nearly interested in, and therefore are concerned to acquaint ourselves with; all our temporal affairs being in a necessary subjection to the Divine providence, and all our spiritual and eternal concerns in a necessary dependence upon the Divine grace; and these two are represented to us in this chapter, the former by a vision, the latter by a type. Here is, I. God as king of nations, ruling the world by the ministry of angels, in the vision of the four chariots, ver. 1—8. II. God as king of saints, ruling the church by the mediation of Christ, in the figure of Joshua the high priest crowned, the ceremony performed, and then explained concerning Christ, ver. 9—15.

AND I turned, and lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came four chariots out from between two mountains; and the mountains were mountains of brass. 2 In the first chariot were red horses; and in the second chariot black horses; 3 And in the third chariot white horses; and in the fourth chariot grisled and bay horses. 4 Then I answered and said unto the angel that talked with me, What are these, my lord? 5 And the angel answered and said unto me, These are the four spirits of the heavens, which go forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth. 6 The black horses which are therein go forth into the north country; and the white go forth after them; and the grisled go forth toward the south country. 7 And the bay went forth, and sought to go that they might walk to and fro through the earth: and he said, Get you hence, walk to and fro through the earth. So they walked to and fro through the earth. 8 Then cried he upon me, and spake unto me, saying, Behold, these that go toward the north country have quieted my spirit in the north country.

The prophet is forward to receive this vision, and, as if he expected it, he turned and lifted up his eyes, and looked. Though this was the seventh vision he had had, yet he doth not think he has had enough; for the more we know of God and his will, if we know it aright, the more desirous we shall be to get a farther acquaintance with God. Now observe here the sight that the prophet had of four chariots drawn by horses of divers colours, together with the explication of the sight, ver. 1—5. He did not look long, but he discovered that which was worth seeing, and which would serve very much for the encouraging of himself and his friends in this dark day. We are very much in the dark concerning the meaning of this vision; some by the four chariots understand the four monarchies; and then they read ver. 5, "These are the four winds of the heavens," and suppose that therein reference is had to Dan. vii. 2, where Daniel saw in a vision the "four winds of the heavens striving upon the great sea," representing the four monarchies. The Babylonian monarchy, they think, is here represented by the red horses, which are not afterwards mentioned, because that monarchy was now extinct. The second chariot, with the black horses, is the Persian monarchy, which went forth northward against the Babylonians, and quieted God's Spirit in the north country, by executing his judgments on Babylon and freeing the Jews from their captivity. The white, the Grecians, go forth after them into the north, for they overthrow the Persians. The grisled, the Romans, who conquered the Grecian empire, are said to go forth toward the south country, because Egypt, which lay southward, was the last branch of the Grecian empire that was subdued by the Roman. The bay horses had been with the grisled, but afterwards went forth by themselves; and by these they understand the Goths and Vandals, who, with their victorious arms, walked to and fro through the earth; or the Seleucidæ or Lagidæ, the two branches of the Grecian empire. Thus Grotius and others.

But I incline rather to understand this vision more generally, as designing to represent the administration of the kingdom of providence in the government of this lower world. The angels are often called the chariots of God, Ps. xviii. 10; lxviii. 17. The various providences of God concerning nations and churches are represented by the different colours of horses, Rev. vi. 2, 4, 5, 8. And so we may observe here,

First. That the counsels and decrees of God are the spring and original of all events, and they are immovable as mountains of brass. The chariots came from between the two mountains; for God performeth the thing that is appointed for us. His appointments are the great originals, and his performances are but copies from them; he doth all according to the counsel of his will. We could as soon grasp the mountains in our arms as comprehend the Divine counsels in our finite understandings, and as soon remove mountains of brass as alter any of God's purposes; for "he is in one mind, and who can turn him?" Whatever the providences of God are concerning us, as to public or private affairs, we should see them all coming from between the mountains of brass, and therefore see it as much our folly to quarrel with them as it is our duty to acquiesce in them. Who may say to God, "What doest thou, or why doest thou so?" Acts ii. 23; iv. 28.

Secondly. That God executes his decrees in the works of providence, which are as chariots, in which he rides as a prince in an open chariot, to shew his glory to the world, in which, as in chariots of war, he rides forth "conquering and to conquer," and triumphing over all the enemies of his glory and government. God is great and terrible in his doings, Ps. lxvi. 3, and in them we "see the goings of our God, our King," Ps. lxviii. 24. His providences move swiftly and strongly as chariots, but all directed and governed by his infinite wisdom and sovereign will, as chariots by their drivers.

Thirdly. That the holy angels are the ministers of God's providence, and are employed by him as the armies of heaven for the executing of his counsels among the inhabitants of the earth. They are the chariots, or, which comes all to one, they are the horses that draw the chariots, great in power and might, and who, like the horse that God himself describeth, Job xxxix. 19, &c., are clothed with thunder, are terrible, but cannot be terrified or made afraid. They are "chariots of fire, and horses of fire," to carry one prophet to heaven and guard another on earth. They are as observant of, and obsequious to, the will of God as well-managed horses are to their rider or driver. Not that God needs them or their services, but he is pleased to make use of them that he may put honour upon them, and encourage our trust in his providence.

Fourthly. That the events of providence have different aspects, and the face of the times often changeth. The horses in the first chariot were red, signifying war and bloodshed, "blood to the horse bridles," Rev. xiv. 20. Those in the second chariot were black, signifying the dismal, melancholy consequences of war; it puts all into mourning, lays all waste, introduceth famines, and pestilences, and desolations, and makes whole lands to languish. Those in the third chariot were white, signifying the return of comfort, and peace, and prosperity after these dark and dismal times. Though God cause grief to the children of men yet will he have compassion. Those in the fourth chariot were of a mixed colour, grisled and bay; some speckled, and spotted, and ash-coloured, signifying events of different complexions, interwoven and counterchanged, a day of prosperity and a day of adversity, set the one over against the other. The cup of providence in the hand of the Lord is full of mixture, Ps. lxxv. 8.

Fifthly. That all the instruments of providence, and all the events of it, come from God, and from him they receive their commissions and instructions; ver. 5, "These are the four spirits of heaven," the four winds, so some, which seem to blow as they list from the various points of the compass; but God has them in his fists, and brings them out of his treasuries. Or, rather, these are the angels that "go forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth," to attend upon him, and minister to him; to behold his glory in the upper world, which is their blessedness, and to serve his glory in this lower world, which is their business. They stand before him as the Lord of the whole earth, to receive orders from him, and give up their accounts to him concerning their services on this earth, for it is all within his jurisdiction. But when he appoints, they go forth as messengers of his counsels, and ministers of his justice and mercy. Those secret motions and impulses upon the spirits of men by which the designs of providence are carried on, some think, are these four spirits of the heavens which go forth from God, and fulfil what he appoints, who is "the God of the spirits of all flesh."

Sixthly. That there is an admirable beauty in providence, and one event serves for a balance to another; ver. 6, "The black horses went forth," carrying with them very dark and melancholy events, such as made every person and every thing look black; but presently "the white went forth after them," carrying joy to them that mourned, and, by a new turn given to affairs, making them to look pleasant again. Such are God's dealings with his church and people. If the black horses go forth, the white ones presently go after them; for, as affliction abounds, consolation much more abounds.

Seventhly. That the common general aspect of providence is mixed and compounded. The grisled and bay horses were both in the fourth chariot, ver. 3; and though they went forth at first towards the south country, yet afterwards they sought to "walk to and fro through the earth," and were directed to do so, ver. 7. If we go to and fro through the earth, we shall find the events of providence neither all black nor all white, but ash-coloured or grey, mixed of black and white, for such is the world we live in; that before us is unmixed. Here we are singing at the same time of mercy and judgment, and we must sing unto God of both, Ps. ci. 1, and labour to accommodate ourselves to God's will and design in the mixtures of providence, rejoicing in our comforts as though we rejoiced not, because they have their alloys; and weeping for our afflictions as though we wept not, because there is so much mercy mixed with them.

Eighthly. That God is well pleased with all the operations of his own providence; ver. 8, "These have quieted my spirit." These black horses which speak extraordinary judgments, and the white ones which speak extraordinary deliverances, both which went toward the north country, while the common mixed providences went all the world over, these have quieted my spirit in the north country, which had of late been the most remarkable scene of action with reference to the church; that is, by these uncommon appearances and actings of providence, God's wrath is executed upon the enemies of the church, and his favours conferred upon the church, both which had long been deferred, and in both God had fulfilled his will, accomplished his word, and so quieted his spirit. "The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake;" and as he speaks, Isa. i. 24, made himself easy.

9 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 10 Take of them of the captivity, even of Heldai, of Tobijah, and of Jedaiah, which are come from Babylon, and come thou the same day, and go into the house of Josiah the son of Zephaniah; 11 Then take silver and gold, and make crowns, and set them upon the head of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest; 12 And speak unto him, saying, Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, saying,

Behold the man whose name is The BRANCH;
And he shall grow up out of his place,
And he shall build the temple of the LORD:
13 Even he shall build the temple of the LORD;
And he shall bear the glory,
And shall sit and rule upon his throne;
And he shall be a priest upon his throne:
And the counsel of peace shall be between them both.

14 And the crowns shall be to Helem, and to Tobijah, and to Jedaiah, and to Hen the son of Zephaniah, for a memorial in the temple of the LORD. 15 And they that are far off shall come and build in the temple of the LORD, and ye shall know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto you. And this shall come to pass, if ye will diligently obey the voice of the LORD your God.

God did not only at sundry times, but in divers manners, speak in time past by the prophets to his church. In the former part of this chapter he spoke by a vision, which the prophet only saw himself; here, in this latter part, he speaks by a sign, or type, which many saw, and which, as it was explained, was an illustrious prediction of the Messiah, as the priest and king of his church. Here is,

First. The significant ceremony which God appointed, and that was the coronation of Joshua the high priest, ver. 10, 11. It is observable that there should be two eminent types of Christ in the Old Testament that were both named Joshua, the same name with Jesus, and by the Septuagint and in the New Testament rendered Jesus, Acts vii. 45: Joshua, the chief captain, a type of Christ the captain of our salvation, and Joshua the chief priest, a type of Christ the high priest of our profession; and both, in their day, saviours and leaders into Canaan. And this is peculiar to Joshua the high priest, that here was something done to him by the Divine appointment on purpose that he might be a type of Christ, a priest after the order of Melchisedek, who was both a king and a priest. Joshua was far from being ambitious of a crown, and the people of having a crowned head over them; but the prophet, to the great surprise of both, is ordered to crown Joshua, as if he had been a king. And as Zerubbabel's prudence and piety kept this from being any affront to him, as the setting up of a rival with him, so God's providences kept the kings of Persia from taking umbrage at it, as raising a rebellion against them. In doing what we are sure is God's pleasure, as this was, we may well venture men's displeasure.

1. Here were some Jews come from Babylon that brought an offering to the house of God. Some of the captivity, here named to their honour, that came from Babylon on a visit to Jerusalem. They ought to have bid a final farewell to Babylon, and to have come and settled with their brethren in their own land; and for their remissness and indifferency in not doing so they thought to atone by this visit. Perhaps they came as ambassadors from the body of the Jews that were in Babylon, who lived there in ease and fulness; and, hearing that the building of the temple went on slowly for want of money, they sent them with an offering of gold and silver for the service of the house of God. Note, Those that by reason of distance, or otherwise, cannot forward a good work by their persons, must, as they are able, forward it by their purses. If some find hands, let others fill them.

2. Time and place are appointed for the prophet to meet them. They thought to bring their present to the priest, God's ordinary minister; but God has a prophet, an extraordinary one, ready to receive them and it, which would be an encouragement to them who in their captivity had so often complained, "We see not our signs, there is no more any prophet;" and would invite them and others to resettle in their own land, which then began to look like itself, like a holy land, when the spirit of prophecy was revived in it. Zechariah was ordered to give them the meeting the same day they came, (for when they were arrived, they would lose no time, but present their offering presently,) and to bid them welcome, assuring them that God accepteth their gifts. He was to meet them in the house of Josiah the son of Zephaniah, who probably was receiver-general for the temple, and kept the treasures of it. They brought their gold and silver to be employed about the temple; but God ordered it to be used in honour of One greater than the temple, Mat. xii. 6.

3. Crowns are to be made, and put upon the head of Joshua, ver. 11. It is supposed that there were two crowns provided, one of silver, and the other of gold; the former (as some think) noting his priestly dignity, the latter his kingly dignity. Or, rather, he being a priest already, and having a crown of gold of pure gold already, to signify his honour and power as a priest, these crowns of silver and gold both signify the royal dignity; the crown of silver being, perhaps, designed to typify the kingdom of the Messiah, when he was here on earth, for then he was the King of Israel, Jno. i. 49, but the crown of gold his kingdom in his exalted state, the glory of which as far exceeded that of the former as gold doth silver. The sun shines as gold when he goes forth in his strength; and the beams of the moon, when she walketh in brightness, we call silver beams. Those that had worshipped the sun and moon shall now fall down before the golden and silver crowns of the exalted Redeemer, before whom the sun shall be ashamed and the moon confounded, being both outshone.

Secondly. The signification which God gave of this ceremony. Every one would be ready to ask what is the meaning of Joshua's being crowned thus, and the prophet is as ready to tell them the meaning of it. Upon this speaking sign is grafted a prediction, and the sign was used to make it the more taken notice of and the better remembered. Now the promise is,

1. That God will, in the fulness of time, raise up a great high priest like Joshua. Tell Joshua that he is but the figure of one that is to come, a faint shadow of him; ver. 12, Speak unto him in the name of the Lord of hosts, that "the man whose name is the Branch" shall "grow up out of his place," out of Bethlehem the city of David, the place appointed for his birth. Though the family be a root in a dry ground, yet this Branch shall spring out of it, as in spring, when the sun returns, the flowers spring out of their roots that lay buried out of sight and out of mind. He shall grow up for himself, so some read it, propria virtute,—'by his own vital energy,' shall be exalted in his own strength.

2. That as Joshua was an active useful instrument in building the temple, so the man the Branch shall be the master builder, the sole builder, of the spiritual temple, the gospel church. He "shall build the temple of the Lord;" and it is repeated again, ver. 13, "Even he shall build the temple of the Lord." He shall grow up to do good, to be an instrument of God's glory, and a great blessing to mankind. Note, The gospel church is "the temple of the Lord, a spiritual house," 1 Pet. ii. 5; a holy temple, Eph. ii. 21. In the temple God made discoveries of himself to his people, and there he received the service and homage of his people; so in the gospel church, the light of Divine revelation shines by the word, and the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise are offered. Now Christ is not only the foundation, but the founder, of this temple, by his Spirit and grace.

3. That Christ shall bear the glory. Glory is a burden, but not too heavy for him to bear who upholdeth all things. The cross was his glory, and he bore that; so was the crown an exceeding weight of glory, and he bears that. The government is upon his shoulders, and in it he bears the glory, Isa. ix. 6. "They shall hang upon him all the glory of his Father's house," Isa. xxii. 24; it becomes him, and he is par negotio,—'well able to bear it.' The glory of the priesthood and royalty had been divided between the house of Aaron and that of David; but now he alone shall bear all the glory of both. That which he shall bear, which he shall undertake, shall be indeed the glory of Israel, and they must wait for that; and, in prospect of that, must be content in the want of that external glory which they formerly had. He shall bear such a glory as shall make the glory of this latter house greater than that of the former. He shall lift up the glory, so it may be read. The glory of Israel had been thrown down and depressed, but he shall raise it out of the dust.

4. That he should have a throne, and be both priest and king upon his throne. A throne notes both dignity and dominion, an exalted honour, with an extensive power. 1st. This priest shall be a king, and his office as a priest shall be no diminution to his dignity as a king: he shall sit and rule upon his throne. Christ, as a priest, ever lives to make intercession for us, but he doth it sitting at his Father's right hand, as one having authority, Heb. viii. 1. We have such a high priest as Israel never had, for "he is set on the right hand of the majesty in the heavens," which puts a prevailing virtue into his mediation. He that appears for us within the veil is one that sits and rules there. Christ, that is ordained to offer sacrifices for us, is authorised to give law to us. He will not save us unless we be willing he should govern us. God has prepared him a throne in the heavens, and if we would have any benefit by that we must prepare him a throne in our hearts, and be willing and glad he should sit and rule upon that throne, and to him every thought within us must be brought into obedience. 2nd. This king shall be a priest, a priest upon his throne. With the majesty and power of a king he shall have the tenderness and simplicity of a priest, who, being taken from among men, is ordained for men, and "can have compassion on the ignorant," Heb. v. 1, 2. In all the acts of his government as a king he prosecutes the intentions of his grace as a priest. Let not those that are his then look upon his throne, though a throne of glory, and a throne of judgment, with terror and amazement; for, as there is a rainbow about the throne, so he is a priest upon the throne.

5. That the "counsel of peace should be between them both." That is, 1st. Between Jehovah and the man the Branch, between the Father and the Son. The counsels concerning the peace to be made between God and man, by the mediation of Christ, shall be concerted, that is, shall appear to have been concerted, by Infinite Wisdom in the covenant of redemption, and that the Father and the Son understood one another perfectly well in that matter. Or, rather, 2nd. Between the priest and the throne, between the priestly and kingly office of Jesus Christ. The man the Branch must grow up to carry on a counsel of peace; peace on earth, and, in order to that, peace with heaven. God's thoughts towards us were thoughts of peace, and in prosecution of them he exalted his Son Jesus Christ to be both a Prince and a Saviour; gave him a throne, but with this proviso, that he should be a priest upon his throne, and by executing the two offices of a priest and king should bring about that great undertaking of man's reconciliation to God, and happiness in God. Some think it alludes to the former government of the Jews' state, wherein the king and priest, separate officers, did take counsel one with and of another, for the maintenance of peace and prosperity in church and state, as did Zerubbabel and Joshua now, I may add, and the prophets of God helping them; so shall the peace and welfare of the gospel church and of all believers be wrought, though not by two several persons, yet by virtue of two several offices meeting in one—Christ purchasing all peace by his priesthood, and maintaining and defending it by his kingdom: so Mr. Pemble. And the prophetical office is serviceable to both in this great design.

6. That there should be a happy coalition between Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, and they should both meet in Christ, the priest upon his throne, as the centre of their unity. "They that are far off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord," ver. 15. Some understand it of the Jews that were now afar off in Babylon, that stayed behind in captivity, to the great discouragement of their brethren that were returned, who wanted their help in building the temple. Now God promiseth that many of them, and some of other nations too, proselyted to the Jewish religion, should come in and lend a helping hand to the building of the temple, and "many hands would make light work." The kings of Persia contributed to the building of the temple, Ezr. vi. 8, and to the furnishing of it, Ezr. vii. 19, 20. And in after times Herod the Great, and others that were strangers, helped to beautify and enrich the temple. But it has a farther reference to the temple of the Lord which the man the Branch was to build. The Gentiles, "strangers afar off," shall help to build it; for from among them God will raise up ministers that shall be workers together with Christ about that building; and all the Gentile converts shall be stones added to this building, so that it shall "grow up to a holy temple," Eph. ii. 20—22. When God's temple is to be built he can fetch in those that are afar off, and employ them in the building of it.

7. That the accomplishment of this would be a mighty confirmation of the truth of God's word; "Ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you." That promise that those that were afar off should come and assist them in "building the temple of the Lord," was as it were the giving of them a sign. By this they might be assured that the other promises should be fulfilled in due time; this should be fulfilled now, very speedily. It was so; for those that had been their enemies and accusers, in obedience to the king's edict, became their helpers, and did speedily what they were ordered to do for the furtherance of the work, and by that means the work went on and was finished: see Ezr. vi. 13, 14. Now by this surprising assistance which they had from afar off in building the temple, they might know that Zechariah, who told them of it before, was sent of God, and therefore his word concerning the man the Branch should be fulfilled.

8. That these promises were strong obligations to obedience; for "this shall come to pass," you shall have help in building the temple, "if ye will diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God." You shall have the help of foreigners in building the temple, if you will but set about it in good earnest yourselves. The assistance of others, instead of being an excuse for our slothfulness, should be a spur to our industry. You shall have the benefit and comfort of all those promises if you make conscience of your duty. They must know that they are upon their good behaviour; and though their God is coming towards them in a way of mercy, they cannot expect him to proceed in it unless they conform to his laws. Note, That which God requires of us to qualify us for his favour is obedience to his revealed will, and it must be a diligent obedience. We cannot obey the voice of God without a great deal of care and pains; nor will our obedience be accepted of God unless it be laboured by us.

Thirdly. The provision that was made to preserve the remembrance of this. The crowns that were used in the solemnity were not given to Joshua, but must be "kept for a memorial in the temple of the Lord," ver. 14. Either they were laid up in the temple treasury, or (as the Jews' tradition is) they were hung up in the windows of the temple, in the view of all, in perpetuam rei memoriam,—'for a perpetual memorial;' for a traditional evidence of the promise of the Messiah, and this typical transaction used for the confirmation of that promise. The crowns were delivered to them who found the materials, (and some think their names were engraven on the crowns,) to be preserved as a public testimony of their pious liberality, and an encouragement to others in like manner to bring presents to the house of God. Note, Various means were used for the support of the faith of the Old Testament saints, who waited for the consolation of Israel till the time, the set time, for it came.

CHAPTER VII.

We have done with the visions, but not with the revelations, of this book; the prophet sees no more such signs as he had seen, but still the word of the Lord came to him. In this chapter we have, I. A case of conscience proposed to the prophet by the children of the captivity concerning fasting, whether they should continue their solemn fasts which they had religiously observed during the seventy years of their captivity, ver. 1—3. II. The answer to this question, which is given in this and the next chapter; and this answer was not given all at once, but by piecemeal, at several times, for here are four distinct discourses that have all of them reference to this case, each prefaced with "The word of the Lord came:" in this chapter, ver. 4—8, and ch. viii. 1, 18; and the method of them is very observable. In this chapter, 1. The prophet sharply reproves them for the mismanagement of their fasts, ver. 4—7; 2. He exhorts them to reform their lives, which would be the best way of fasting, and to take heed of those sins which brought those judgments upon them which they kept these fasts in memory of, ver. 8—14. And then in the next chapter, having searched the wound, he binds it up, and heals it, with gracious assurances of great mercy God had yet in store for them, by which he would turn their fasts into feasts.

AND it came to pass in the fourth year of king Darius, that the word of the LORD came unto Zechariah in the fourth day of the ninth month, even in Chisleu; 2 When they had sent unto the house of God Sherezer and Regem-melech, and their men, to pray before the LORD, 3 And to speak unto the priests which were in the house of the LORD of hosts, and to the prophets, saying, Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years? 4 Then came the word of the LORD of hosts unto me, saying, 5 Speak unto all the people of the land, and to the priests, saying, When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and seventh month, even those seventy years, did ye at all fast unto me, even to me? 6 And when ye did eat, and when ye did drink, did not ye eat for yourselves, and drink for yourselves? 7 Should ye not hear the words which the LORD hath cried by the former prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited and in prosperity, and the cities thereof round about her, when men inhabited the south and the plain?

This occasional sermon which the prophet preached, and which is recorded in this and the next chapter, was above two years after the former, in which he gave them an account of his visions, as appears by comparing the date of this, ver. 1, in the ninth month of the fourth year of Darius, with the date of that, ch. i. 1, in the eighth month of the second year of Darius. Not that Zechariah was idle all the while, (it is expressly said that he and Haggai continued prophesying till the temple was finished in the sixth year of Darius, Ezr. vi. 14, 15;) but during that time he did not preach any sermon that was afterwards published, and left upon record, as this here. God may be honoured, his work done, and his interests served, by word of mouth as well as by writing; and by inculcating and pressing what has been taught, as well as by advancing something new. Now here we have,

First. A case proposed concerning fasting. Some persons were sent to inquire of the priests and prophets whether they should continue to observe their yearly fasts, particularly that in the fifth month, as they had done. It is uncertain whether the case was put by those that yet remained in Babylon, who, being deprived of the benefit of the solemn feasts which God's ordinance appointed them, made up the want by the solemn fasts which God's providences called them to; or by those that were returned, but lived in the country, as some rather incline to think, because they are called "the people of the land," ver. 5. But as to that, the answer given to the messengers of the captive Jews might be directed not to them only, but to all the people. Observe,

1. Who they were that came with this inquiry. Sherezer and Regem-melech, persons of some rank and figure; for they came with their men, and did not think it below them, or any disparagement to them, to be sent on this errand, but rather an addition to their honour, to be, 1st. Attendants in God's house; there to do duty, and receive orders. The greatest of men are less than the least of the ordinances of Jesus Christ. 2nd. Agents for God's people to negotiate their affairs. Men of estates, having more leisure than men of business, ought to employ their time in the service of the public, and by doing good they make themselves truly great. The messengers of the churches were the glory of Christ, 2 Cor. viii. 23.

2. What the errand was upon which they came. They were sent, perhaps, not with gold and silver, as those, ch. vi. 10, 11, or, if they were, that is not mentioned, but upon the two great errands which should bring us all to the house of God: 1st. To intercede with God for his mercy. They were sent to pray before the Lord, and some think (according to the usage then) to offer sacrifice, with which they offered up their prayers. The Jews in captivity prayed towards the temple, as appears, Dan. vi. 10; but, now it was in a fair way to be rebuilt, they send their representatives to pray in it, remembering what God had said, that his house should be called a "house of prayer for all people," Isa. lvi. 7. In prayer we must set ourselves as before the Lord, must see his eye upon us, and have our eye up to him. 2nd. To inquire of God concerning his mind. Note, When we offer up our requests to God, it must be with a readiness to receive instructions from him; for if we turn away our ear from hearing his law we cannot expect that our prayers should be acceptable to him. We must therefore desire to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of our life, that we may inquire there, Ps. xxvii. 4; to ask, not only, Lord, what wilt thou do for me? but, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

3. Whom they consulted. They spoke "to the priests that were in the house of the Lord, and to the prophets." The former were an oracle for ordinary cases, the later for extraordinary; they were blessed with both, and would try if either could acquaint them with the mind of God in this case. Note, God having given diversities of gifts to men, and all to profit with, we should make use of all as there is occasion. They were not so wedded to the priests, their stated ministers, as to distrust the prophets, who appeared by the gifts given them well qualified to serve the church; nor yet were they so much enamoured with the prophets as to despise the priests, but they spoke both to the priests and to the prophets; and in consulting both gave glory to the God of Israel, and that one Spirit who worketh all in all. God might speak to them either by Urim, or by prophets, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, and therefore they would not neglect either. The priests and the prophets were not jealous one of another, nor had any difference among themselves; let not the people then make differences between them, but thank God they had both. The prophets did indeed reprove what was amiss in the priests, but at the same time told the people that the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they must "inquire the law at his mouth;" for "he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts," Mal. ii. 7. Note, Those that would know God's mind should consult God's ministers, and, in doubtful cases, ask advice of those whose special business it is to search the Scriptures.

4. What the case was which they desired satisfaction in; ver. 3, "Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself as I have done these so many years?" Observe,

1st. What had been their past practice. Not only during the seventy years of the captivity, but to this time, which was twenty years after the liberty proclaimed them, they kept up solemn stated fasts for humiliation and prayer, which they religiously observed according as their opportunities were, in their closets, families, or such assemblies for worship as they had. In the case here they mention only one, that of the fifth month; but it appears by ch. viii. 19, that they observed four anniversary fasts: one in the fourth month, (June 17,) in remembrance of the breaking up of the wall of Jerusalem, Jer. lii. 6; another in the fifth month, (July 4,) in remembrance of the burning of the temple, Jer. lii. 12, 13; another in the seventh month, (September 3,) in remembrance of the killing of Gedaliah, which completed their dispersion; and another in the tenth month, (December 10,) in remembrance of the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxv. 1. Now it was very commendable in them to keep those fasts, thus to humble themselves under those humbling providences by which God called them to weeping and mourning, thus to accommodate themselves to their troubles, and to prepare themselves for deliverance. It would likewise be a means of possessing their children betimes with a due sense of the hand of the Lord gone out against them.

2nd. What was their present doubt—whether they should continue their fasts or no. The case is put by a single person, "Should I weep?" But it was the case of many, and the satisfaction of one would be a satisfaction to the rest; or perhaps many had left it off. But the querist will not be determined by the practice of others; if God will have him continue it, he will, whatever others do. His fasting is described by his weeping,—separating himself. A religious fast must be solemnized not only by abstinence, here called a separating ourselves from the ordinary lawful comforts of life, but by a godly sorrow for sin, here expressed by weeping. Should I still keep such "days to afflict the soul as I have done these so many years?" It is said, ver. 5, to be seventy years computed from the last captivity, as before, ch. i. 12. The inquiry intimates a readiness to continue it, if God so appoint, though it be a mortification to the flesh. First. Something is to be said for the continuance of these fasts. Fasting and prayer is good work at any time, and doth good; we have always both cause enough and need enough to humble ourselves before God. To throw off these fasts would be an evidence of their being too secure, and a cause of their being more so. They were still in distress, and under the tokens of God's displeasure; and it is unwise for the patient to break off his course of physic while he is sensible of such remains of his distemper. But, Secondly. There is something to be said for the letting fall of these fasts. God had changed the method of his providence concerning them, and was returned in ways of mercy to them; and ought not they then to change the method of their duties? Now the bridegroom is returned, why should "the children of the bridechamber fast?" Every thing is beautiful in its season; and as to the fast of the fifth month, which is that they particularly inquire of, that being kept in remembrance of the burning of the temple, might seem to be superseded, rather than any of the other, because the temple was now in a fair way to be rebuilt. But, having long kept up this fast, they would not leave it off without advice, and without asking and knowing God's mind in the case. Note, A good method of religious services, which we have found beneficial to ourselves and others, ought not to be altered without good reason, and therefore not without mature deliberation.

Secondly. An answer given to this case. And it should seem, though the question looked plausible enough, they that proposed it were not conscientious in it, for they were more concerned about the ceremony than about the substance; they seemed to boast of their fasting, and to upbraid God Almighty with it, that he had not sooner returned in mercy to them: For we have done it these so many years. As those, Isa. lviii. 3, "Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest not?" And some think that an unbelief and distrust of the promises of God was at the bottom of their inquiry; for, if they had given them the credit that was due to them, they needed not to doubt but that their fasts ought to be laid aside now the occasion of them was laid aside. And therefore the first answer to their inquiry is a very sharp reproof of their hypocrisy, directed not only to the people of the land, but to the priests, who had set up these fasts, and perhaps some of them were for keeping them up to serve some purpose of their own. Let them all take notice, that whereas they thought they had made God very much their debtor by these fasts, they were much mistaken; for they were not acceptable to him unless they had been observed in a better manner, and to better purpose.

1. What they did that was good was not done aright; ver. 5, "You fasted and mourned." They were not chargeable with the omission or neglect of the duty, though it was displeasing to the body, (Thy fasts were continually before me, Ps. l. 8;) but they had not managed them aright. Note, Those that come to inquire of their duty must be willing to be told of their faults. And those that seem zealous for the outside of a duty ought to examine themselves faithfully whether they have the regard they ought to have to the inside of it.

1st. They had not an eye to God in their fasting: "Did ye at all fast unto me, even to me?" He appeals to their own consciences; they will witness against them, that they had not been sincere in it; much more will God, who is greater than the heart, and knows all things. You know very well you did not at all fast to me: in fasting did you fast to me? There was the carcase and form of the duty, but none of the life, and soul, and power of it. Was it to me, even to me? The repetition intimates what a great deal of stress is laid upon this, as the main matter in that and other holy exercises, that they be done to God, even to him, with an eye to his word as our rule, and his glory as our end in them: seeking to please him, and to obtain his favour, and studious by the sincerity of our intentions to approve ourselves to him. When this was wanting every fast was but a jest. To fast, and not fast to God, was to mock him, and provoke him, and could not be pleasing to him. Those that make fasting a cloak for sin, as Jezebel's fast, or by it make their court to men for their applause, as the Pharisees, or that rest in outward expressions of humiliation while their hearts are unhumbled, as Ahab, do they fast to God, even to him? "Is this the fast that God hath chosen?" Isa. lviii. 5. If the solemnities of our fasting, though frequent, long, and severe, do not serve to put an edge upon devout affections, to quicken prayer, to increase godly sorrow, and to alter the temper of our minds and the course of our lives for the better, they do not at all answer the intention, and God will not accept them as performed to him, even to him.

2nd. They had the same eye to themselves in their fasting that they had in their eating and drinking; ver. 6, "When ye did eat, and when ye did drink" on other days, nay, perhaps on your fast-days, in the observation of which you could, when you saw cause, dispense with yourselves, and take a liberty to eat and drink, did ye not "eat for yourselves, and drink for yourselves?" Have you not always done as you had a mind yourselves? Why then do you now pretend a desire to know the mind of God? In your religious feasts and thanksgivings you have had no more an eye to God than in your fasts. Or rather it refers to their common meals: they did no more design the honour of God in their fasting and praying than they did in their eating and drinking; but self was still the centre in which the lines of all their actions, natural, civil, and religious, met. They needed not be in such care about the continuance of their fasts, unless they had kept them better. Note, We miss our end in eating and drinking when we eat to ourselves and drink to ourselves, whereas we should eat and drink to the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31, that our bodies may be fit to serve our souls in his service.

2. The principal good thing they should have done was left undone; ver. 7, "Should ye not hear the words which the Lord has cried by the former prophets?" Yes, that you should have done on your fast-days; it was not enough to weep and separate yourselves on your fast-days, in token of your sorrow for the judgments you were under, but you should have searched the Scriptures of the prophets, that you might have seen what was the ground of God's controversy with your fathers, and might have taken warning by their miseries not to tread in the steps of their iniquities. You ask, Shall you do as you have done in fasting? No, you must do that which you have not yet done, you must repent of your sins, and reform your lives; that is it that we now call you to, and it is the same that the former prophets called your fathers to. To affect them the more with the mischiefs that sin had done them, that they might be brought to repent of it, he puts them in mind of the former flourishing state of their country. Jerusalem was then inhabited, and in prosperity, that is now desolate and in distress; the cities round about, that are now in ruins, were then inhabited too and in peace; the country, likewise, was very populous. "Men inhabited the south of the plain," which was not at all fortified, and yet they lived safely, and which was fruitful, and so they lived plentifully; but then God by the prophets cried to them, as one in earnest, and importunate with them to amend their ways and doings, or else their prosperity would soon be at an end. Now, saith the prophet, you should have taken notice of that, and have inferred that what was required of them for the preventing of the judgments, and which they did not, is required of you for the removal of the judgments, and, if you do it not, all your fasting and weeping signify nothing. Note, The words of the late prophets agree with those of the former; and whether people are in prosperity or adversity, they must be called upon to leave their sins, and do their duty; this must be the burthen of every song.

8 And the word of the LORD came unto Zechariah, saying, 9 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, saying,

Execute true judgment,
And shew mercy and compassions every man to his brother:
10 And oppress not the widow,
Nor the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor;
And let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart.
11 But they refused to hearken,
And pulled away the shoulder,
And stopped their ears, that they should not hear.
12 Yea, they made their hearts as an adamant stone,
Lest they should hear the law,
And the words which the LORD of hosts hath sent
In his spirit by the former prophets:
Therefore came a great wrath from the LORD of hosts.
13 Therefore it is come to pass, that as he cried,
And they would not hear;
So they cried,
And I would not hear, saith the LORD of hosts:
14 But I scattered them with a whirlwind
Among all the nations whom they knew not.
Thus the land was desolate after them,
That no man passed through nor returned:
For they laid the pleasant land desolate.

What was said, ver. 7, that they should have heard the words of the former prophets, is here enlarged upon for warning to these hypocritical inquirers, who continued their sins when they very precisely asked whether they should continue their fasts. This prophet had before put them in mind of their fathers' disobedience to the calls of the prophets, and what came of it, ch. i. 4—6, and here again,—for others' harms should be our warnings. God's judgments upon Israel of old for their sins were written for admonition to us Christians, 1 Cor. x. 11; and the same use we should make of the like providences in our own day.

First. This prophet here repeats the heads of the sermons which the former prophets preached to their fathers, ver. 9, 10, because the very same things were required of them now. Thus doth the Lord of hosts speak to you now, and thus he did speak to your fathers, saying, "Execute true judgment." The duties here required of them, which would have been the lengthening of the tranquillity of their fathers, and must be the restoring of their tranquillity, are not keeping fasts, and offering sacrifices, but doing justly and loving mercy; duties which they were bound to by the light and law of nature, though there had been no prophets sent to insist upon them; duties which had a direct tendency to the public welfare and peace, and which they themselves would be the gainers by, and not God. 1. Magistrates must administer justice impartially, according to the maxims of the law, and the merits of the cause, without respect of persons. "Judge judgment of truth," and execute it when ye have judged it. 2. Neighbours must have a tender concern for one another, and must not only do one another no wrong, but must be ready to do all the good offices that lay in their power one to another. They must "shew mercy and compassion every man to his brother," as the case called for it. The infirmities of others, as well as their calamities, are to be looked upon with compassion. Hanc veniam petimusque damusque vicissim,—'This kindness we ask and exercise.' 3. They must not bear hard upon those that they have advantage against, and that they know are not able to help themselves. They must not, either in commerce or in course of law, oppress "the widow, the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor," ver. 10. The weakest must not therefore be thrust to the wall because they are weakest. No thanks to men not to deny right to those that are in a capacity to demand it, and recover it; but we must, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake, give those their own who have not power to force it from us. Or, it intimates that that which is but exactness with others is exaction upon the widows and the fatherless; nay, that not relieving and helping them as we ought is, in effect, oppressing them. 4. They must not only not do wrong to any, but they must not so much as desire it, or think of it; "Let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart." Do not project it, do not wish it, nay, do not so much as please yourself with the fancy of it. The law of God lays a restraint upon the heart, and forbids the entertaining, forbids the admitting, of a malicious, spiteful, ill-natured thought; Deu. xv. 9, "Beware that there be not a thought in thy Belial heart against thy brother."

Secondly. He describes the wilfulness and disobedience of their fathers, who persisted in all manner of wickedness and injustice, notwithstanding these exhortations and admonitions frequently given them in God's name. Various expressions to this purpose are here heaped up, ver. 11, 12; setting forth the stubbornness of that carnal mind which is enmity against God, and is not in subjection to the law of God, neither indeed can be. They were obstinate and refractory, and persisted in their transgressions of the law, purely from a spirit of contradiction to the law. 1. They would not, if they could help it, come within hearing of the prophets, but kept at a distance. Or, if they could not avoid hearing what they said, yet they resolved they would not heed it; they refused to hearken, and looked another way, as if they had not been spoken to. 2. If they did hear what was said to them, and as it seemed inclined at first to comply with it, yet they flew off when it came to the setting to, and like a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, "they pulled away the shoulder," and would not submit to the easy yoke and light burthen of God's commandments. 'They gave a withdrawing shoulder,' so the word is; they seemed to lay their shoulder to the work, but they presently withdrew it again, as those Jer. xxxiv. 10, 11. They were like a deceitful bow, as that son that said, "I go, sir, but went not." 3. They filled their own minds with prejudices against the word of God; and had some objection or other ready wherewith to fortify themselves against every sermon they heard. "They stopped their ears that they should not hear," as the deaf adder, Ps. lviii. 4; and none so deaf as those that will not hear; those that make their own ear heavy, as the word is. 4. They resolved that nothing that was said to them for the enforcing of these injunctions should make any impression upon them; "They made their hearts as an adamant stone," as a diamond, the hardest of stones to be wrought upon; or as flint, which the mason cannot hew into shape, as he can other stones out of the quarry. Nothing so hard, so unmalleable, so inflexible, as the heart of a presumptuous sinner; and they whose hearts are hard may thank themselves: they are of their own hardening; and it is just with God to give them over to a reprobate sense, to the hardness and impenitence of their own hearts. These stubborn sinners hardened their hearts on purpose, lest they should hear what God said to them by the written word, by the law of Moses, and by the words of the prophets that preached to them; they had had Moses and the prophets, but resolved they would hear neither, nor would they have been persuaded though one had been sent to them from the dead. The words of the prophets were not regarded by them, though they were words which the Lord of hosts sent and directed to them, though he sent them immediately by his Spirit in the prophets; so that in despising them they affronted God himself and resisted the Holy Ghost. Note, The reason why men are not good is, because they will not be so; they will not consider, they will not comply, and therefore, "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it."

Thirdly. He shews the fatal consequences of it to their fathers; "Therefore came great wrath from the Lord of hosts." God was highly displeased with them, and justly; he required nothing of them but what was reasonable in itself, and beneficial to them, and yet they refused, and in a most insolent manner too; what master could bear to be so abused by his own servant? Such an implacable enmity to the Gospel as this here to the law and the prophets was that which brought wrath to the uttermost upon the last generation of the Jewish church, 1 Thes. ii. 16. Great sins against the Lord of hosts, whose authority is incontestable, bring "great wrath from the Lord of hosts," whose power is irresistible. And the effect was, 1. As they had turned a deaf ear to God's word, so God turned a deaf ear to their prayers; ver. 13, "As he cried" to them in their prosperity to leave their sins, "and they would not hear," but persisted in their iniquities, so "they cried to him" in the day of their trouble, to remove his judgments, and he would not hear, but lengthened out their calamities. They that set God at defiance in the height of their pride, yet when pangs came upon them cried unto him: "Lord, in trouble have they visited thee." But God hath said it, and will abide by it, "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be an abomination," Pr. i. 24; xxviii. 9. Iniquity regarded in the heart will certainly spoil the success of prayer, Ps. lxvi. 18. 2. As they flew off from their duty and allegiance to God, and were of desultory and unsettled spirits, so God dissipated them, and threw them about as chaff before a whirlwind; he "scattered them among all the nations whom they knew not," and whom therefore they could not expect to receive any kindness from, ver. 14. 3. As they violated all the laws of their land, so God took away all the glories of it; "their land was desolate after them, and no man passed through, or returned." All that country that was the kingdom of the two tribes, after the dispersion of the remaining Jews, upon the slaughter of Gedaliah, was left utterly uninhabited. There was not man, woman, or child, in it till the Jews returned at the end of the seventy years' captivity; nay, it should seem the very roads that lay through the country were deserted,—none passed or repassed; which, as it had an intimation of mercy in it, though they were cast out of it, yet it was kept empty for their return, so for the present it made the judgment appear much the more dismal; for what a horrid wilderness must a land be that had been so many years uninhabited? And they might thank themselves; it was they that by their own wickedness laid the pleasant land desolate. It was not so much the Chaldeans that did it, no, they did it themselves; the desolations of a land are owing to the wickedness of its inhabitants, Ps. cvii. 34. This came of their wilful disobedience to the law of God. And the present generation saw how desolate sin had made that pleasant land, and yet would not take warning.

CHAPTER VIII.

The work of ministers is rightly to divide the word of truth, and to give every one their portion. So the prophet is here instructed to do, in the farther answer he gives to the case of conscience proposed about continuing the public fasts. His answer in the foregoing chapter is by way of reproof to those that were disobedient, and would not obey the truth: but here he is ordered to change his voice, and to speak by way of encouragement to the willing and obedient. Two words here are from the Lord of hosts, and they are both good words and comfortable words. In the first of these messages, ver. 1, God promiseth that Jerusalem shall be restored, reformed, ver. 2—8; that the country shall be rich, and the affairs of the nation shall be successful, their reputation retrieved, and their state, in all respects, the reverse of what it had been for many years past, ver. 9—15; and then exhorts them to reform what was amiss among them, that they might be ready for these favours designed them, ver. 16, 17. In the latter of these messages, ver. 18, he promiseth that their fasts should be superseded by the return of mercy, ver. 19; and that thereupon they should be replenished, enriched, and strengthened by the accession of foreigners to them, ver. 20—23.

AGAIN the word of the LORD of hosts came to me, saying,
2 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
I was jealous for Zion with great jealousy,
And I was jealous for her with great fury.
3 Thus saith the LORD; [Jerusalem:
I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of
And Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth;
And the mountain of the LORD of hosts the holy moun-
4 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; [tain.
There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem,
And every man with his staff in his hand for very age.
5 And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.
6 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, [of hosts.
Should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the LORD
7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Behold, I will save my people from the east country,
And from the west country; [of Jerusalem:
8 And I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst
And they shall be my people, and I will be their God,
In truth and in righteousness.

The prophet in his foregoing discourses had left his hearers under a high charge of guilt, and a deep sense of wrath, had left them in a melancholy view of the desolations of their pleasant land, which was the effect of their fathers' disobedience; but, because he designed to bring them to repentance, not to drive them to despair, he here sets before them the great things God had in store for them, encouraging them hereby to hope that their case of conscience should shortly determine itself, and God's providence should as loudly call them to joy and gladness as ever it called them to fasting and mourning.

First. It is here promised that God will appear for Jerusalem, and will espouse and plead her cause. 1. He will be revenged on Zion's enemies; ver. 2, "I was jealous for Zion," or of Zion, that is, I have of late been so heartily concerned for her honour and interests, "with great jealousy." The great wrath that was against her, ch. vii. 12, now turned against her adversaries. I am now "jealous for her with great fury," and can no more bear to have her abused in her afflictions than I could bear to be abused by her provocations. This he had said before, ch. i. 14, 15, that they might promise themselves as much from the power of his anger, when it was turned for them, as they had felt from it, when it was against them. The sins of Zion were her worst enemies, and had done her the most mischief, and therefore God, in his jealousy for her honour and comfort, will take away her sins, and then, whatever other enemies injured her, it was at their peril. 2. He will be resident in Zion's palaces; ver. 3, "I am returned to Zion," after I had seemed so long to stand at a distance, and I will again "dwell in the midst of Jerusalem," as formerly. This secures to them the tokens of his presence in his ordinances, and the instances of his favour in his providences.

Secondly. That there shall be a wonderful reformation in Jerusalem, and religion, in the power of it, shall prevail and flourish there. Jerusalem, that had dealt treacherously both with God and man, shall become so famous for fidelity and honesty, that it shall be called and known by the name of a city of truth, and the inhabitants of it children that will not lie. The faithful city had become a harlot, Isa. i. 21, but shall now become a faithful city again; faithful to the God of Israel, and to the worship of him only. This was fulfilled; for the Jews after the captivity, though there was much amiss among them, yet were never guilty of idolatry. Jerusalem shall be called "the mountain of the Lord of hosts," owning him and owned by him, and therefore "the holy mountain," cleared from idols, and consecrated to God, and not, as it had been, the mount of corruption, 2 Kin. xxiii. 13. Note, The city of God ought to be a city of truth, and the mountain of the Lord of hosts a holy mountain. Those that profess religion and relation to God must study to adorn their profession by all instances of godliness and honesty.

Thirdly. That there shall be in Jerusalem a great increase of people, and all the marks and tokens of a profound tranquillity. When it has become a city of truth, and a mountain of holiness, it is then peaceable and prosperous, and every thing in it looks bright and pleasant.

1. You may look with pleasure upon the generation that is going off the stage, and see them fairly quitting it in the ordinary course of nature, and not driven off it by war, famine, or pestilence; ver. 4, "In the streets of Jerusalem," that had been filled with the bodies of the slain, or deserted, and left desolate, shall now dwell old men, and old women, that have not been cut off by untimely deaths, either through their own intemperance or God's vengeance, but have the even thread of their days spun out to a full length; they shall feel no distemper but the decay of nature, and go to their grave in a full age, as a "shock of corn in his season." They shall have every one his staff in his hand for very age, to support him, as Jacob, that "worshipped leaning upon the top of his staff," Heb. xi. 21. Old age needs a support, should not be ashamed to use it, but should furnish itself with Divine graces, which will be the strength of the heart, and a better support than a staff in the hand. Note, The hoary head, as it is a crown of glory to those that wear it, so it is to the places where they live. It is a graceful thing to a city to see abundance of old people in it; it is a sign not only of the healthfulness of the air, but of the prevalency of virtue, and the suppression and banishment of those many vices which cut off the number of men's months in the midst; a sign not only that the climate is temperate, but that the people are so.

2. You may look with as much pleasure upon the generation that is rising up in their room; ver. 5, "The streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets." This intimates, 1st. That they shall be blessed with a multitude of children, their families shall increase and multiply, and replenish the city, which was an early product of the Divine blessing, Gen. i. 28. Happy the man, happy the nation, whose quiver is full of these arrows. They shall have of both sexes, boys and girls, in whom their families shall afterwards be joined, and another generation raised up. 2nd. That their children shall be healthful, and strong, and active; their boys and girls shall not lie sick in bed, or sit pining in the corner, but (which is a pleasant sight to parents) shall be hearty and cheerful, and play in the streets. It is their pleasant, playing age; let us not grudge it them, much good may it do them, and no harm. Evil days will come time enough, and years of which they will say they have no pleasure in them; in consideration of which they are concerned not to spend all their time in play, but to remember their Creator. 3rd. That they shall have great plenty, and meat enough for all their mouths. In time of famine we find the children swooning as the wounded, in the streets of the city, Lam. ii. 11, 12. If they are playing in the streets, it is a good sign that they want for nothing. 4th. That they shall not be terrified with the alarms of war, but enjoy a perfect security. There shall be no breaking in of invaders, no going out of deserters, no complaining in the streets, Ps. cxliv. 14; for when there is playing in the streets it is a sign there is little care or fear there. Time was when the enemy hunted their steps so close that they could not go in their streets, Lam. iv. 18; but now they shall play in the streets, and fear no evil. 5th. That they shall have love and peace among themselves; the boys and girls shall not be fighting in the streets, as sometimes, in cities that are divided into factions and parties, the children soon imbibe and express the mutual resentments of the parents; but they shall be innocently and lovingly playing in the streets, not devouring, but diverting one another. 6th. That the sports and diversions used shall be all harmless and inoffensive. The boys and girls shall have no other play but what they are willing shall be seen in the streets, no play that seeks corners, no playing the fool, or playing the wanton,—for it is the mountain of the Lord, the holy mountain,—but honest and modest recreations, which they have no reason to be ashamed of. 7th. That childish, youthful sports shall be confined to the age of childhood and youth. It is pleasant to see the boys and girls playing in the streets, but it is ill-favoured to see men and women playing there, that should fill up their time with work and business. It is well enough for children to be sitting in the market place, crossing questions, Mat. xi. 16, 17; but it is no way fit that men who are able to work in the vineyard should stand all the day idle there, Mat. xx. 3.

Fourthly. That the scattered Israelites shall be brought together again from all parts whither they were dispersed; ver. 7, "I will save my people from the east country, and from the west;" will save them from being lost, or losing themselves, in Babylon, or in Egypt, or in any other country whither they were driven. They shall neither be detained by the nations among whom they sojourn nor incorporate with them; but I will save them, will separate them, and will bring them to their own land again; will by the prosperity of that invite them back, and at the same time incline them to return; and "they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem," shall choose to dwell there, because it is the holy city, though upon many other accounts it was more eligible to dwell in the country; and therefore we find, Neh. xi. 2, that "the people blessed all the men who willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem."

Fifthly. That God would renew his covenant with them, would be faithful to them, and make them so to him; "They shall be my people, and I will be their God." That is the foundation and crown of all these promises, and is inclusive of all happiness. They shall obey God's laws, and God will secure and advance all their interests. This contract shall be made, shall be new made, "in truth and righteousness." Some think the former speaks God's part of the covenant,—he will be their God in truth, he will make good all his promises of favour to them; and the latter speaks man's part of the covenant,—they shall be his people in righteousness, they shall be a righteous people, and shall abound in the fruit of righteousness, and shall not, as they have done, deal treacherously and unjustly with their God: see Hos. ii. 19, 20. God will never leave nor forsake them in a way of mercy, as he has promised them; and they shall never leave nor forsake him in a way of duty, as they have promised him. These promises were fulfilled in the flourishing state of the Jewish church for some ages, betwixt the captivity and Christ's time, but were to have a farther and fuller accomplishment in the gospel church, that heavenly Jerusalem, which is from above, is free, and is the mother of us all, and fullest of all in the future state.

All these precious promises are hereby ratified, and the doubts of God's people silenced with that question; ver. 6, "If it be marvellous in the eyes of this people, should it be marvellous in mine eyes?" If it seem unlikely to you that ever Jerusalem should be thus repaired, should be thus replenished, is it therefore impossible with God? The "remnant of this people," (and God's people in this world are but a remnant,) being few and feeble, thought all this was too good news to be true, especially in these days, these difficult days, these cloudy and dark days: considering how bad the times are, it is highly improbable, it is morally impossible, they should ever come to be so good as the prophet speaks: how can these things be? how can dry bones live? But should it therefore appear so in the eyes of God? We do both God and ourselves a deal of wrong if we think that, when we are nonplussed, he is so, and that he cannot get over the difficulties which to us seem insuperable. With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible; so far are God's thoughts and ways above ours.

9 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Let your hands be strong,
Ye that hear in these days these words by the mouth of the prophets,
Which were in the day that the foundation of the house of the LORD of hosts was laid,
That the temple might be built.
10 For before these days there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast;
Neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in
Because of the affliction:
For I set all men every one against his neighbour.
11 But now I will not be unto the residue of this people
As in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts.
12 For the seed shall be prosperous;
The vine shall give her fruit,
And the ground shall give her increase,
And the heavens shall give their dew;
And I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things.
13 And it shall come to pass,
That as ye were a curse among the heathen,
O house of Judah, and house of Israel;
So will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing:
Fear not, but let your hands be strong.
14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts;
As I thought to punish you,
When your fathers provoked me to wrath,
Saith the LORD of hosts, and I repented not:
15 So again have I thought in these days
To do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah:
Fear ye not.
16 These are the things that ye shall do;
Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour;
Execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates:
17 And let none of you imagine evil in your hearts against his neighbour;
And love no false oath:
For all these are things that I hate, saith the LORD.

God, by the prophet, here gives farther assurances of the mercy he had in store for Judah and Jerusalem. Here is line upon line for their comfort, as before there was for their conviction. Mighty encouragements these verses contain, with reference to the difficulties they now laboured under. And we may observe,

First. Who they were to whom these encouragements did belong. To those who, in obedience to the call of God by his prophets, applied themselves in good earnest to the building of the temple; ver. 9, "Let your hands be strong," that are busy at work for God, "you that hear in these days these words by the mouth of the prophets," and are not disobedient to them, as your fathers were in the former days to the words of those prophets that were sent to them; you may take the comfort of the promises, and shall have the benefit of them who have obeyed the precept given you "in the day that the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid," when you were told that, having begun with it, you must go on, "that the temple might be built." God told you you must go on with it, and you have laboured hard at it for some time, in obedience to the heavenly vision: now you are they whose hands must be strengthened, and whose hearts must be comforted, with these precious promises; to you is the word of this consolation sent. Note, Those, and those only, that are employed for God, may expect to be encouraged by him,—those who lay their hands to the plough of duty shall have them strengthened with the promises of mercy; and those who mend of their fathers' faults not only cut off the entail of the curse, but have it turned into a blessing.

Secondly. What the discouragements were which they had hitherto laboured under, ver. 10. These are mentioned as a foil to the blessings God was now about to bestow upon them, to make them appear the more strange, to the glory of God, and the more sweet, to their comfort. The truth was, the times had long been very bad, and the calamities and difficulties of them were many and great.

1. Trade was dead; there was nothing to be done, and therefore nothing to be got. "Before these days" of reformation began, "there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beasts;" the fruits of the earth (though it had long lain fallow, and therefore one would think should have been the more fertile,) were thin and poor; so that the husbandman had no occasion to hire harvest people to reap his corn, or teams to carry it home, for it came to next to nothing. Merchants had no goods to import or export, so that they needed not to hire either man or beast; by which means the poor people, that lived by their labour, had no way of getting bread for themselves and their families.

2. Travelling was dangerous; so that all commerce, both by sea and land, was cut off. Nay, none durst stir abroad so much as to visit their friends, for "there was no peace to him that went out or came in, because of the affliction;" the Samaritans and Ammonites, and other their evil neighbours, made inroads upon them in small parties, and seized all they could lay their hands on. The roads were infested with highwaymen, and both city and country with housebreakers; so that neither men's persons nor their goods were safe at home or abroad.

3. There was no such thing as friendship or good neighbourhood among them; "I set all men every one against his neighbour." In this there was a great deal of sin, for these wars and fightings came from men's lusts, and this God was not the author of; but there was in it a great deal of misery also, and so God was in it a just avenger of their disobedience to him. Because they were of an evil spirit towards him, a spirit of contradiction to his laws, God sent among them an evil spirit, to make them vexatious one to another. Those that throw off the love of God forfeit the comfort of brotherly love.

Thirdly. What encouragement they shall now have to proceed in the good work they are about, and to hope that it shall yet be well with them. Thus and thus you have been harassed and afflicted, but now God will change his way towards you, ver. 11. Now you return to your duty God will comfort you according to the time that he has afflicted you; the ebbing tide shall flow again.

1. God will not proceed in his controversy with them; "I will not be to them as in the former days." Note, It is with us well or ill according as God is to us, for every creature is that to us which he makes it to be; and if we walk not contrary to God, "as in the former days," he will not walk contrary to us, as in the former days; for it is only "with the froward that he will wrestle."

2. They shall have great plenty and abundance of all good things, ver. 12. The seed sown shall be prosperous, and yield a great increase; "The vine shall give her fruit," which makes glad the heart, and the ground its products, which strengthen the heart. They shall have all they can desire, not only for necessity, but for ornament and delight. The "heavens shall give their dew," without which the earth would not yield her increase, which is a constant intimation to us of the beneficence of the God of heaven to men on earth, and their dependence upon him. It is said of a sweeping rain that it leaves no food, Pr. xxviii. 3; but here the gentle dew waters the earth, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater. And thus God will "cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things." They are but a remnant, a residue, very few,—one would think scarce worth looking after; but, now they are at work for God, he will take care they shall want nothing that is fit for them. This confirms what the prophet's colleague had said a little before, Hag. ii. 16, 19, "From this day will I bless you." Note, God's people, that serve him faithfully, have great possessions: All is yours, for you are Christ's.

3. They shall recover their credit among their neighbours; ver. 13, "Ye were a curse among the heathen." Every one censured and condemned them, spake ill of them, and wished ill to them, upon the account of the great disgrace that they were under. Some think they were made a form of execration, so that if a man would load his enemy with the heaviest curse, he would say, God make thee like a Jew! but now, "I will save you, and you shall be a blessing." Your restoration shall be as much taken notice of to your honour as ever your desolation and dispersion were to your reproach; you shall be applauded and admired as much as ever you were vilified and run down, shall be courted and caressed as much as ever you were slighted and abandoned. Most men smile or frown upon their neighbours according as Providence smiles or frowns on them; but those whom God plainly blesseth, as his own, shews favour to, and puts honour upon, we ought also to respect and be kind to. The blessed of the Lord are the blessing of the land, and should be so accounted by us. This is here promised to the house both of Israel and Judah; for many of the ten tribes returned out of captivity with the two tribes, and shared with them in those blessings; and it is probable, besides what came at first, many, very many, flocked to them afterwards, when they saw their affairs take this turn.

4. God himself will determine to do them good, ver. 14, 15. All their comforts take rise from the thoughts of love God had towards them, Jer. xxix. 11. Compare these promises with the former threatenings. 1st. When they provoked him to anger with their sins he said he would punish them, and so he did. It was his declared purpose to bring destroying judgments upon them; and because they repented not of their rebellions against him, he repented not of his threatenings against them, but let the sentence of the law take its course. Note, God's punishing of sinners is never a sudden and hasty resolve, but is always the product of thought, and there is a counsel in that part of the will of God. And if the sinner turn not, God will not turn. 2nd. Now they pleased him with their services, he said he would do them good; and will he not be as true to his promises as he was to his threatenings? No doubt he will. "So again have I thought to do well to Jerusalem in those days," when you begin to hearken to the voice of God speaking to you by his prophets; and these thoughts also shall be performed.

Fourthly. The use they are to make of these encouragements.

1. Let them take the comfort which these promises give to them. "Fear not," ver. 15; "Let your hands be strong," ver. 9; and both together, ver. 13, "Fear not, but let your hands be strong." 1st. The difficulties they met with in their work must not drive them from it, or make them go on heavily in it, for the issue would be good, and the reward great. Let this therefore animate them to proceed with vigour and cheerfulness. 2nd. The dangers they were exposed to from their enemies must not terrify them. Those that have God for them, engaged to do them good, need not fear what man can do against them.

2. Let them do the duty which these promises call for from them, ver. 16, 17. The very same duties which the former prophets pressed upon their fathers, from the consideration of the wrath threatened, ch. vii. 9, 10, this prophet presseth upon them from the consideration of the mercy promised. Leave it to God to perform for you what he has promised in his own way and time, but upon condition that you make conscience of your duty. "These are the things then that ye shall do;" this is your part of the covenant, the articles which you are to perform, fulfil, and keep, that you may not put a bar in your own door, and stop the current of God's favours. 1st. You must never tell a lie, but always speak as you think, and as the matter is, to the best of your knowledge; "Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour," both in bargains and common converse; dread every word that looks like a lie. This precept the apostle quotes, Eph. iv. 25, and backs it with this reason, "We are members one of another." 2nd. Those that are intrusted with the administration of public justice must see to it, not only that none be wronged by it, but that those who are wronged be righted by it; "Execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates." Let the judges that sit in the gates in all their judicial proceedings have regard both to truth and to peace; let them take care both to do justice and to accommodate differences, and prevent vexatious suits. It must be a judgment of truth, in order to peace, and making those friends that were at variance; and a judgment of peace, so far as is consistent with truth, and no farther. 3rd. No man must bear malice against his neighbour upon any account. This is the same with what we had ch. vii. 10. We must not only keep our hands from doing evil, but we must watch over our hearts, that "they imagine not any evil" against our neighbour, Pr. iii. 29. Injury and mischief must be crushed in the thought, in the embryo. 4th. Great reverence must be had for an oath, and conscience made of it: Never take a false oath; nay, "love no false oath;" that is, hate it, dread it, keep at a distance from it. Love not to impose oaths upon others, lest they swear falsely; love not that any should take a false oath for your benefit, and forswear themselves to do you a kindness. Here is a very good reason against all these corrupt practices annexed: For "all these things I hate," and therefore you must hate them if you expect to have God your friend. These things here forbidden are all of them found among the "seven things which the Lord hates," Pr. vi. 16—19. Note, We must forbear sin, not only because God is angry at it, and therefore it is dangerous to us, but because he hates it, and therefore it ill becomes us, and is a very ungrateful thing.

18 And the word of the LORD of hosts came unto me, saying, 19 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and chearful feasts; therefore love the truth and peace. 20 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; It shall yet come to pass, that there shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities: 21 And the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the LORD, and to seek the LORD of hosts: I will go also. 22 Yea, many people and strong nations shall come to seek the LORD of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the LORD. 23 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you.

Here are two precious promises in these verses, for the farther encouragement of those pious Jews that were hearty in building the temple.

First. That a happy period shall be put to their fasts, and there shall be no more occasion for them, but they shall be converted into thanksgiving days, ver. 19; this is a direct answer to the inquiry concerning their fasts, ch. vii. 3. Those of them that fasted in hypocrisy had their doom in the foregoing chapter; but those that in sincerity humbled themselves before God, and sought his face, have here a comfortable assurance given them of a large share in the happy times approaching. The four yearly feasts they had religiously observed should be to "the house of Judah joy and gladness, and solemn feasts," and those cheerful ones. Note, Joyous times will come to the church after troublous times; if weeping endure for more than a night, and joy come not the next morning, yet the morning will come that will introduce it at length. And when God comes towards us in ways of mercy, we must meet him with joy and thankfulness; when God turns judgments into mercies, we must turn fasts into festivals, and thus "walk after the Lord." And those who sow in tears with Zion shall reap in joy with her; those that submit to the restraints of her solemn fasts while they continue, shall share in the triumphs of her cheerful feasts when they come, Isa. lxvi. 10. The inference from this promise is, "Therefore love the truth and peace;" that is, be faithful and honest in all your dealings, and let it be a pleasure to you to be so, though thereby you cut yourselves short of those gains which you see others get dishonestly; and as much as in you lies live peaceably with all men, and be in your element when you are in charity. Let the truths of God rule in our heads, and let the peace of God rule in our hearts.

Secondly. That a great accession shall be made to the church by the conversion of many foreigners, ver. 20—23. This was fulfilled but in part when, in the latter times of the Jewish church, there were abundance of proselytes from all the countries about, and some that lay very remote, who came yearly to worship at Jerusalem; which added very much both to the grandeur and wealth of that city, and contributed greatly to the making of it so considerable as it came to be before our Saviour's time, though now it was but just peeping out of its ruins. But it would be accomplished much more fully in the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ, and the incorporating of them with the believing Jews in one great body, under Christ the head, a mystery which is made manifest by the Scriptures of the prophets, Rom. xvi. 26, and by this among the rest, which makes it strange that when it was accomplished it was so great a surprise and stumbling-block to the Jews. Observe,

1. Who they are that shall be added to the church. "People, and the inhabitants of many cities," ver. 20; not only a few ignorant country people that may be easily imposed upon, or some idle people that have nothing else to do, but intelligent, inquisitive citizens, men of business and acquaintance with the world, shall embrace the Gospel of Christ. "Yea, many people and strong nations," ver. 22; some of "all languages," ver. 23. By this it appears that they are brought into the church, not by human persuasion, for they are of different languages; not by external force, for they are strong nations, able to have kept their ground if they had been so attacked, but purely by the effectual working of Divine truth and grace. Note, God has his remnant in all parts; and at the general assembly of the church of the first-born some will be found "out of all nations and kindreds," Rev. vii. 9.

2. How their accession to the church is described. They shall come to "pray before the Lord," and to "seek the Lord of hosts," ver. 21; and, to shew that this is the main matter in which their conversion consists, it is repeated, ver. 22, they shall "come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem," and to "pray before the Lord." No mention is made of their offering sacrifices, not only because those were not expected from the "proselytes of the gate," but because, when the Gentiles should be brought in, sacrifice and offering should be quite abolished. See who are to be accounted converts to God, and members of the church; and all that are converts to God are members of the church. 1st. They are such as seek the Lord of hosts, that inquire for God their Maker, covet and court his favour, and are truly desirous to know his mind and will, and sincerely devoted to his honour and glory; "This is the generation of them that seek him." 2nd. They are such as pray before the Lord; that make a conscience and make a business of the duty of prayer; that dare not, that would not, for all the world, live without it; that by prayer pay their homage to God, own their dependence upon him, maintain their communion with him, and fetch in mercy and grace from him. 3rd. They are such as herein have an eye to the Divine revelation and institution, which is signified by their doing this in Jerusalem, the place which God had chosen, where his word was, where his temple was, that was a type of Christ and his mediation, which all faithful worshippers will have a faithful regard to.

Thirdly. How unanimous they shall be in their accession to the church, and how zealous in exciting one another to it; ver. 21, "The inhabitants of one city shall go to another," as formerly, when they went up from all parts of the country to worship at the yearly feasts, and they shall say, "Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord; I will go also." This intimates, 1. That those who are brought into an acquaintance with Christ themselves should do all they can to bring others acquainted with him. Thus Andrew invited Peter to Christ, and Philip invited Nathanael; true grace hates monopolies. 2. That those who are rightly sensible of their need of Christ, and of the favour of God through him, will stir up themselves and others without delay to hasten to him; "Let us go speedily to pray;" it is for our lives, and the lives of our souls, that we are to petition, and therefore it concerns us to lose no time; in a matter of such moment delays are dangerous. 3. That our communion with God is very much assisted and furthered by the communion of saints. It is pleasant going "to the house of God in company," Ps. lv. 14; "with the multitude," Ps. xlii. 4; and of good use to those that do so, to excite one another to go speedily, and lose no time. We should be glad when it is said to us, "Let us go," Ps. cxxii. 1. As iron sharpens iron, so may good men sharpen the countenances and spirits one of another in that which is good. 4. That those who stir up others to that which is good must take heed that they do not turn off, or tire, or draw back themselves; he that saith, "Let us go," saith, "I will go also." What good we put others upon doing we must see to it that we do ourselves, else we shall be judged out of our own mouths. Not, Do you go, and I will stay at home; but, Do you go, and I will go with you. 'A singular pattern,' saith Pemble, 'of zealous charity, that neither leaves others behind nor turns others before it.'

Fourthly. Upon what inducement they shall join themselves to the church. Not for the church's sake, but for his sake who dwells in it; ver. 23, "Ten men," of different nations and languages, shall "take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew," begging of him not to outgo them, but to take them along with him. This speaks the great honour they have for a Jew, as one of the chosen people of God, and therefore well worthy their acquaintance. They cannot all come to take him by the hand, or embrace him in their arms, but are ambitious to take hold of the skirt of his robe, to touch the hem of his garment, saying, "We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you." The Gospel was preached to the Jews first, (for of that nation the apostles were,) and by them it was carried to the Gentiles. St. Paul was a Jew, whose skirt many took hold of, when they welcomed him as an angel of God, and begged of him to take them along with him to Christ. Thus the Greeks took hold of Philip's skirt, saying, "Sir, we would see Jesus," Jno. xii. 21. Note, It is the privilege of the saints that they have God with them, have him among them—the knowledge, and fear, and worship of him. They have his favour and gracious presence, and this should invite us into communion with them. It is good being with those that have God with them, and those who join themselves to the Lord must join themselves to his disciples. If we take God for our God, we must take his people for our people; cast in our lot among them, and be willing to take our lot with them.

CHAPTER IX.

At this chapter begins another sermon, which is continued to the end of ch. xi., and it is called, "The burden of the word of the Lord," for every word of God has weight in it to those that regard it, and will be a heavy weight upon those that do not—a dead weight. Here is, I. A prophecy against the Jews' unrighteous neighbours, the Syrians, Tyrians, Philistines, and others, ver. 1—6; with an intimation of mercy to some of them in their conversion, ver. 7; and a promise of mercy to God's people in their protection, ver. 8. II. A prophecy of their righteous king, the Messiah, and his coming, with a description of him, ver. 9, and of his kingdom, the nature and extent of it, ver. 10. III. An account of the obligation the Jews lay under to Christ, for their deliverance out of their captivity in Babylon, ver. 11, 12. IV. A prophecy of the victories and successes God would grant the Jews over their enemies, as typical of our great deliverance by Christ, ver. 13—15. V. A promise of great plenty, and joy, and honour, which God had in reserve for his people, ver. 16, 17, which was written for their encouragement.

THE burden of the word of the LORD in the land of
And Damascus shall be the rest thereof: [Hadrach,
When the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel,
Shall be toward the LORD.
2 And Hamath also shall border thereby;
Tyrus, and Zidon, though it be very wise.
3 And Tyrus did build herself a strong hold,
And heaped up silver as the dust,
And fine gold as the mire of the streets.
4 Behold, the Lord will cast her out,
And he will smite her power in the sea;
And she shall be devoured with fire.
5 Ashkelon shall see it, and fear;
Gaza also shall see it, and be very sorrowful,
And Ekron; for her expectation shall be ashamed;
And the king shall perish from Gaza,
And Ashkelon shall not be inhabited.
6 And a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod,
And I will cut off the pride of the Philistines.
7 And I will take away his blood out of his mouth,
And his abominations from between his teeth:
But he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God,
And he shall be as a governor in Judah,
And Ekron as a Jebusite. [army,
8 And I will encamp about mine house because of the
Because of him that passeth by,
And because of him that returneth:
And no oppressor shall pass through them any more:
For now have I seen with mine eyes.

After the precious promises we had in the foregoing chapter of favour to God's people, their persecutors that hated them come to be reckoned with, those particularly that bordered close upon them.

First. The Syrians had been ill neighbours to Israel, and God has a controversy with them. The word of the Lord shall be a burthen in the land of Hadrach, that is, of Syria; but it doth not appear why it was so called. That that kingdom is meant is plain, because Damascus, the metropolis of that kingdom, is said to be the rest of this burthen; that is, the judgments here threatened shall light and lie upon that city. Those are miserable upon whom the burthen of the word of the Lord rests, upon whom the wrath of God abides, Jno. iii. 36; for it is a weight that they can neither shake off nor bear up under. There are those whom God causeth his fury to rest upon; whom the wrath of God makes its mark it will be sure to hit, whom it makes its rest it will be sure to sink. And the reason of this burthen resting on Damascus is, because "the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel," (or rather, 'even of all the tribes of Israel,') are "towards the Lord;" that is, because the people of God by faith and prayer look up to him for succour and relief, and depend upon him to take their part against their enemies. Note, It is a sign God is about to appear remarkably for his people when he raiseth their believing expectations from him, and dependence upon him, and when by his grace he turns them from idols to himself; Isa. xvii. 7, 8. "At that day shall a man look to his Maker." It may be read thus, 'For the Lord has an eye upon man, and upon all the tribes of Israel,' that is, he is King of nations, as well as King of saints, governs the world as well as the church; and, therefore, will punish the sins of other people as well as those of his own people. God is Judge of all, and therefore all must give account of themselves to him. When St. Paul was converted at Damascus, and preached there, and disputed with the Jews, then the word of the Lord might be said to rest there; and then the eyes of men, of other men besides the tribes of Israel, began to be towards the Lord: see Acts ix. 22. Hamath, a country which lay north of Damascus, and which we often read of, "shall border thereby," ver. 2; it joins to Syria, and shall share in the "burden of the word of the Lord" that rests upon Damascus. The Jews have a proverb, 'Woe to the wicked man, and woe to his neighbour,' who is partaking in his sins and in his plagues. Woe to the land of Hadrach, and woe to Hamath that borders thereby.

Secondly. Tyre and Zidon come next to be called to an account here, as in other prophecies, ver. 2—4. Observe here,

1. Tyre flourishing, thinking herself very safe, and ready to set God's judgments not only at a distance, but at defiance; for, 1st. She is very wise. It is spoken ironically; she thinks herself very wise, and able to outwit even the wisdom of God. It is granted her king is a great politician, her statesmen are so, Eze. xxviii. 3; but with all their wit and policy they shall not be able to evade the judgments of God when they come with commission,—there is no wisdom or counsel against the Lord. Nay, it is his honour to take the wise in their own craftiness. 2nd. She is very strong, and well fortified, both by nature and art. "Tyrus did build herself a stronghold," which she thought could never be brought down, or got over. 3rd. She is very rich, and money is a defence; it is the sinews of war, Eccl. vii. 12. By her vast trade she hath "heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets;" that is, she has an abundance of them, heaps of silver as common as heaps of sand, Job xxvii. 16. Solomon made silver to be in Jerusalem as the "stones of the streets;" but Tyre went farther, and made fine gold to be as "the mire of the streets." It were well if we could all learn so to look upon it, in comparison with the merchandise of wisdom and grace, and the gains thereof.

2. Tyrus falling, after all; her wisdom, and wealth, and strength shall not be able to secure her; ver. 4, "The Lord will cast her out" of that stronghold wherein she has fortified herself; will make her poor, so some read it. There have been instances of those that have fallen from the height of plenty to the depth of poverty, and great riches have come to nothing. God will smite her power in the sea; her being surrounded by the water shall not secure her, but "she shall be devoured with fire," and burnt down to the ground. Tyrus, being seated in the midst of the water, one would have thought was in danger to be some time or other overflowed or washed away by that, yet God chooseth to destroy it by the contrary element; sometimes he brings ruin upon his enemies by those means which they least suspect. Water enough was nigh at hand to have quenched the flames of Tyre, and yet by them she shall be devoured; for who can put out the fire which the breath of the Almighty blows up?

Thirdly. God next contends with the Philistines, with their great cities and great lords, that bordered southward upon Israel.

1. They shall be alarmed and affrighted by the word of the Lord lighting and resting upon Damascus, ver. 5; the disgraces of Israel had many a time been published in the streets of Ashkelon, and they had triumphed in them; but now Ashkelon shall see the ruin of her friends and allies, and shall fear. "Gaza also shall see it, and be very sorrowful, and Ekron," concluding that their own turn comes next, now the cup of trembling goes round. What will become of their house when their neighbour's is on fire? They had looked upon Tyre and Zidon as a barrier to their country, but when those strong cities were ruined their expectations from them were ashamed, as our expectation from all creatures will be in the issue.

2. They shall themselves be ruined and wasted. 1st. The government shall be dissolved; "The king shall perish from Gaza," not only the present king shall be cut off, but there shall be no succession, no successor. 2nd. The cities shall be dispeopled; "Ashkelon shall not be inhabited," the rightful owners shall be expelled, either slain or carried into captivity. 3rd. Foreigners shall take possession of their land, and become masters of all its wealth; ver. 6, "A bastard shall dwell in Ashdod," a spurious brood of strangers shall enter upon the inheritances of the natives, which they have no more right to than a bastard has to the estates of the legitimate children. And thus God will "cut off the pride of the Philistines," all that strength and wealth which they prided themselves in, and which was the ground of their confidence in themselves, and their contempt of the Israel of God. This prophecy of the destruction of the Philistines, and of Damascus and Tyre, was accomplished not long after this by Alexander the Great, who ravaged all these countries with his victorious army, took the cities, and planted colonies in them, which Quintus Curtius gives a particular account of in the history of his conquests. And some think he is meant by the bastard that shall dwell in Ashdod; for his mother, Olympia, owned him begotten in adultery, but pretended it was by Jupiter. The Jews afterwards got ground of the Philistines, Syrians, and others their neighbours, took some of their cities from them, and possessed their countries; as appears by the histories of Josephus and the Maccabees. And this was predicted before, Zep. ii. 4, &c.; Oba. 20.

3. Some among them shall be converted and brought home to God by his Gospel and grace; so some understand ver. 7, as a promise, 1st. That God would take away the sins of these nations, their blood and their abominations, their cruelties and their idolatries. God will part between them and these sins, which they have rolled under their tongue as a sweet morsel, and are as loath to part with as men are to part with the meat out of their mouths, and which they hold fast between their teeth. Nothing is too hard for the grace of God to do. 2nd. That he would accept of a remnant of them for his own; "He that remaineth shall be for our God." God would preserve a remnant even of these nations, that should be the monuments of his mercy and grace, and be set apart for him; and the disadvantages of their birth shall be no bar to their acceptance with God, but a Philistine shall be as acceptable to God upon gospel terms as one of Judah, nay, as a governor or chief one in Judah; and a man of Ekron shall be as a Jebusite or man of Jerusalem, as a proselyted Jebusite, as Araunah the Jebusite, 2 Sam. xxiv. 8. In Christ Jesus there is no distinction of nations, but all are one in him, all alike welcome to him.

Fourthly. In all this God intends mercy for Israel; and it is in kindness to them that God will deal thus with the neighbouring nations, to avenge their quarrel for what is past, and to secure them for the future. Thus some understand the seventh verse, as intimating,

1. That thus God would deliver his people from their bloody adversaries that hated them, and to whom they were an abomination, then when they were just ready to devour them, and make a prey of them; "I will take away his blood," that is, the blood of Israel, out of the mouth of the Philistines, and from between their teeth, Am. iii. 12, when in their hatred of them, and enmity to them, they were greedily devouring them.

2. That he would thus give them victory and dominion over them; And "he that remaineth," that is, the remnant of Israel, "shall be for our God;" shall be taken into his favour, shall own him, and be owned by him, and "he shall be as a governor in Judah." Though the Jews have long been in servitude, they shall recover their ancient dignity, and be victorious, as David and other governors in Judah formerly were; and Ekron, that is, the Philistines, shall be as the Jebusites, and the rest of the devoted nations were brought into subjection under them. However, this is plainly the sense of ver. 8, that God will take his people under his special protection, and therefore will weaken their neighbours, that it may not be in their power to do them a mischief; "I will encamp about my house because of the army." Note, God's house lies in the midst of an enemy's country, and his church is as a lily among thorns; and, therefore, God's power and goodness are to be observed in the special preservation of it. The camp of the saints, being a little flock in comparison with the numerous armies of the powers of darkness that are set against it round about, would certainly be swallowed up, if the angels of God did not encamp about it, as they did about Elisha, to deliver it, Rev. xx. 9; Ps. xxxiv. 7. When the times are more than ordinarily perilous, when armies are marching and counter-marching, and all bearing ill-will to Zion, then providence will as it were double its guards upon the church of God; "because of him that passeth by, and because of him that returneth," that, whether he return a conqueror or conquered, he may do it no harm. And as none that pass by shall hurt them, so "no oppressor shall pass through them any more;" they shall have no enemy within themselves to rule them with rigour, and to make their lives bitter to them with sore bondage, as of old in Egypt. This was fulfilled when, for some time after the struggles of the Maccabees, Judæa was a free and flourishing state; or perhaps when Alexander the Great, struck with an awe of Jaddus the high priest, favoured the Jews, and took them under his protection, at the same time when he wasted the neighbouring countries. And the reason given for all this is, "For now have I seen with mine eyes;" now have I carefully distinguished between my people and other people, with whom before they seemed to have had their lot in common, and have made it to appear that I know them that are mine. This agrees with Ps. xxxiv. 15, "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous;" now his eyes, which "run to and fro through the earth," shall fix upon them, that he may shew himself tender of them, and "strong on their behalf," 2 Chr. xvi. 9.

9 Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion;
Shout, O daughter of Jerusalem:
Behold, thy King cometh unto thee;

He is just, and having salvation;
Lowly, and riding upon an ass,
And upon a colt the foal of an ass.
10 And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim,
And the horse from Jerusalem,
And the battle bow shall be cut off:
And he shall speak peace unto the heathen:
And his dominion shall be from sea even to sea,
And from the river even to the ends of the earth.
11 As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant
I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water.

That here begins a prophecy of the Messiah and his kingdom is plain from the literal accomplishment of the ninth verse, and its express application to Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, Mat. xxi. 5; Jno. xii. 15.

First. Here is notice given of the approach of the Messiah, promised as matter of great joy to the Old Testament church; "Behold, thy king cometh unto thee." Christ is a king, invested with regal powers and prerogatives, a sovereign prince, an absolute monarch, having all power both in heaven and on earth. He is Zion's king; God hath "set him upon his holy hill of Zion," Ps. ii. 6. In Zion his glory as of a king shines; thence his law went forth, even the word of the Lord. In the gospel church his spiritual kingdom is administered; it is by him that the ordinances of the church are instituted, and its offices commissioned; and it is taken under his protection; he fights the church's battles, and secures its interest as its king. This king has been long in coming, but now, Behold, he cometh, he is at the door; there are but few ages more to run out, and he that shall come will come; he cometh unto thee. The Word will shortly be made flesh, and dwell within thy borders; he will come to his own. And therefore rejoice, rejoice greatly and shout for joy! Look upon it as good news, and be assured it is true. Please thyself to think that he is coming, that he is on his way towards thee, and be ready to go forth to meet him with acclamations of joy, as one not able to conceal it, it is so great, nor ashamed to own it, it is so just; cry, Hosanna to him. Christ's approaches ought to be the church's applauses.

Secondly. Here is such a description of him as renders him very amiable in the eyes of all his loving subjects, and his coming to them very acceptable. 1. He is a righteous ruler; all his acts of government will be exactly according to the rules of equity, for he is just. 2. He is a powerful protector to all those that bear faith and true allegiance to him; for he hath salvation, he hath it in his power, he hath it to bestow upon all his subjects. He is the God of salvation; treasures of salvation are in him. He is servatus,—'saving himself,' so some read it; rising out of the grave by his own power, and so qualifying himself to be our Saviour. 3. He is a meek, humble, tender Father to all his subjects as his children. He is lowly, he is poor and afflicted, (so the word signifies, so it notes the meanness of his condition,) having emptied himself; he was despised and rejected of men. But the evangelist translates it so as to speak the temper of his spirit; he is meek, not taking state upon him, or resenting injuries, but humbling himself from first to last, condescending to the mean, compassionate to the miserable. This was a bright and excellent character of him as a prophet, Mat. xi. 29, "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart," and no less so as a king. It was a proof of this that when he made his public entry into his own city, and it was the only passage of his life that had any thing in it magnificent in the eye of the world, he chose to ride, not upon a stately horse, or in a chariot, as great men used to ride, but upon an ass, a beast of service indeed, but a poor silly and contemptible one, low and slow, and in those days only ridden by the meaner sort of people. Nor was it an ass fitted for use, but an ass's colt, a little foolish, unmanageable thing, that would be more likely to disgrace his rider than be any credit to him, and that not his own neither, nor helped off, as sometimes a sorry horse is, by good furniture, for he had no saddle, no housings, no trappings, no equipage, but his disciples' clothes thrown upon the colt; for he made himself of no reputation when he visited us in great humility.

Thirdly. His kingdom is here set forth in the glory of it. This king has and will have a kingdom, not of this world, but a spiritual kingdom, a kingdom of heaven. 1. It shall not be set up and advanced by external force, by an arm of flesh, or weapons of warfare that are carnal; no, he "will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem," ver. 10, for he shall have no occasion for them while he himself rides upon an ass. He will in kindness to his people cut off their horses and chariots, that they may not cut themselves off from God, by putting that confidence in them which they should put in the power of God only. He will himself undertake their protection, will himself be a wall of fire about Jerusalem, and give his angels charge concerning it, those "chariots of fire and horses of fire;" and then the chariots and horses they had had in their service shall be discarded and cut off as altogether needless. 2. It shall be propagated and established by the preaching of the Gospel, the speaking of peace to the heathen; for Christ came and preached peace to them that were afar off, and to them that were nigh, and so established his kingdom by proclaiming on earth peace and goodwill towards men. 3. His kingdom, as far as it prevails in the minds of men, and has the ascendant over them, will make them peaceable, and slay all enmities; it will cut off the battle-bow and beat swords into ploughshares; it will not only command the peace, but will create the fruit of the lips, peace. 4. It shall extend itself to all parts of the world, in defiance of the opposition given to it. The chariot and horse, that came against Ephraim and Jerusalem to oppose the progress of Zion's king, shall be cut off; his Gospel shall be preached to the world, and be received among the heathen, so that "his dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth," as was foretold by David, Ps. lxxii. 8. The preachers of the Gospel shall carry it from one country, one island, to another, till some of the remotest corners of the world are enlightened and reduced by it.

Fourthly. Here is an account of the great benefit procured for mankind by the Messiah, which is redemption from extreme misery, typified by the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity; ver. 11, "As for thee also," thee, O daughter of Jerusalem, or thee, O Messiah the prince, "by the blood of thy covenant," that is, by force and virtue of the covenant made with Abraham, sealed with the blood of circumcision, and the covenant made with Israel at mount Sinai, sealed with the blood of sacrifices, in pursuance and performance of that covenant, I have now of late sent for thy prisoners, thy captives, out of Babylon, which was to them a most uncomfortable place, as a pit in which was no water. It was part of the covenant, that if in the land of their captivity they sought the Lord, he would be found of them, Lev. xxvi. 42, 44, 45; Deu. xxx. 4. It was by the blood of that covenant typifying the blood of Christ, in whom all God's covenants with man are Yea and Amen, that they were released out of captivity; and this was but a shadow of the great salvation wrought out by thy king, O daughter of Zion. Note, A sinful state is a state of bondage: it is a spiritual prison; it is a pit or a dungeon in which there is no water, no comfort at all to be had. We are all by nature prisoners in this pit; the Scripture has concluded us all under sin, and bound us over to the justice of God. God is pleased to deal upon new terms with these prisoners, to enter into another covenant with them. The blood of Christ is the blood of that covenant, purchased it for us, and all the benefits of it; by that blood of the covenant effectual provision is made for the sending forth of these prisoners upon easy and honourable terms, and proclamation made of liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that were bound, like Cyrus's proclamation to the Jews in Babylon, which all those whose spirits God stirreth up will come and take the benefit of.

12 Turn you to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope:
Even to day do I declare that I will render double unto [thee;
13 When I have bent Judah for me,
Filled the bow with Ephraim,
And raised up thy sons, O Zion,
Against thy sons, O Greece,
And made thee as the sword of a mighty man.

ANCIENT GREEKS.

14 And the LORD shall be seen over them,
And his arrow shall go forth as the lightning:
And the Lord GOD shall blow the trumpet,
And shall go with whirlwinds of the south.
15 The LORD of hosts shall defend them;
And they shall devour, and subdue with sling stones;
And they shall drink, and make a noise as through wine;
And they shall be filled like bowls,
And as the corners of the altar.
16 And the LORD their God shall save them in that day
As the flock of his people:
For they shall be as the stones of a crown,
Lifted up as an ensign upon his land.
17 For how great is his goodness, and how great is his Corn shall make the young men chearful, [beauty!
And new wine the maids.

The prophet, having taught those that were returned out of captivity to attribute their deliverance to the blood of the covenant and to the promise of the Messiah, for therefore they were so wonderfully helped, because that blessing was in them, was yet in the womb of their nation, now comes to encourage them with the prospect of a joyful and happy settlement, and of glorious times before them; and such a happiness they did enjoy in a great measure for some time; but these promises have their full accomplishment in the spiritual blessings of the Gospel which we enjoy by Jesus Christ.

First. They are invited to look unto Christ, and fly unto him as their city of refuge; ver. 12, "Turn ye to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope." The Jews that were returned out of captivity into their own land were yet in effect but prisoners, (We are servants this day, Neh. ix. 36;) yet prisoners of hope, or expectation, for God had given them a little reviving in their bondage, Ezr. ix. 8, 9. Those that yet continued in Babylon, detained by their affairs there, yet lived in hope some time or other to see their own land again. Now both these are directed to turn their eyes upon the Messiah set before them in the promise as their stronghold, to shelter themselves in him, and stay themselves upon him, for the perfecting of the mercy which by his grace, and for his sake, was so gloriously begun: "Look unto him, and be ye saved," Isa. xlv. 22. The promise of the Messiah was the stronghold of the faithful long before his coming; they saw his day at a distance, and were glad; and the believing expectation of this redemption in Jerusalem was long the support and consolation of Israel, Lu. ii. 25, 38. They in their dangers and distresses were ready to turn towards this and the other creature for relief, but the prophets directed them still to turn to Christ, and to comfort themselves with the joy of their king coming to them with salvation. But, as their deliverance was typical of our redemption by Christ, ver. 11, so this invitation to the stronghold speaks the language of the gospel call. Sinners are prisoners, but they are prisoners of hope; their case is sad, but it is not desperate. Yet now there is hope in Israel concerning them; Christ is a stronghold for them, a strong tower, in whom they may be safe and quiet from the fear of the wrath of God, the curse of the law, and the assaults of spiritual enemies; to him they must turn by a lively faith, to him they must fly, and trust in his name.

Secondly. They are assured of God's favour to them. "Even to-day do I declare,"—when things are at the worst, and you think your case deplorable to the last degree, yet I solemnly promise,—that "I will render double unto thee," to thee, O Jerusalem, to every one of you prisoners of hope; I will give you comforts double to the sorrows you have experienced, or blessings double to what I ever bestowed upon your fathers, when their condition was at the best; the glory of your latter state, as well as of your latter house, shall be greater, shall be twice as great, as that of your former. And so it was no otherwise but by the coming of the Messiah, the preaching of his Gospel, and the setting up of his kingdom. These spiritual blessings in heavenly things were double to what they had ever enjoyed in their most prosperous state. As a pledge of this, in the fulness of time God here promiseth to the Jews victory, plenty, and joy in their own land, which yet should be but a type and shadow of more glorious victories, riches, and joys in the kingdom of Christ.

1. They shall triumph over their enemies. The Jews, after their return, were surrounded with enemies on all sides; they were as a speckled bird, all the birds of the field were against them. Their land lay between the two potent kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, branches of the Grecian monarchy, and what frequent dangers they should be in between them was foretold, Dan. xi. But it is here promised that out of them all the Lord would deliver them; and this promise had its primary accomplishment in the times of the Maccabees, when the Jews made head against their enemies, kept their head above water, and after many struggles and difficulties came to be head over them. It is promised,

1st. That they shall be instruments in God's hand, for the defeating and baffling of their persecutors. "I have bent Judah for me," as my bow of steel; that bow I have filled with Ephraim as my arrows, have drawn it up to its full bent, till the arrow be at the head; for some think that is signified by the phrase of filling the bow. The expressions here are very fine, and the figures lively. Judah had been taught the use of the bow, 2 Sam. i. 18; and Ephraim had been famous for it, Ps. lxxviii. 9. But let them not think that they gain their successes by their own bow; for they themselves are no more than God's bow and his arrows—tools in his hand, which he makes use of and manageth as he pleaseth, which he holds as his bow, and directs to the mark as his arrows. The best and bravest of men are but what God makes them, and do no more service than he enables them to do. The preachers of the Gospel were the bow in Christ's hand, with which he went forth; he went on "conquering and to conquer," Rev. vi. 2. The following words explain this: "I have raised up" and spirited "thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece." This was fulfilled when against Antiochus, one of the kings of the Grecian monarchy, the people that knew their God were strong, and did exploits, Dan. xi. 32. And they in the hand of an almighty God were made "as the sword of a mighty man," which none can stand before. Wicked men are said to be God's sword, Ps. xvii. 13, and sometimes good men are made so, for he employs both as he pleaseth.

2nd. That God will be Captain and Commander-in-chief over them in every expedition and engagement; ver. 14, "The Lord shall be seen over them;" he shall make it appear that he presides in their affairs, and that in all their motions they are under his conduct, as apparently, though not so sensibly, as he was seen in Israel in the pillar of cloud and fire, when he led them through the wilderness. First. Is their army to be raised or mustered, and brought into the field? "The Lord shall blow the trumpet," to gather the forces together, to proclaim the war, to sound the alarm, and to give directions which way to march, which way to move; for if God blow the trumpet it shall not give an uncertain sound, or a feeble, ineffectual one. Secondly. Is the army taking the field and entering upon action? Whatever enterprise the campaign is opened with, God shall go forth at the head of their forces "with whirlwinds of the south," which were of incredible swiftness and fierceness; and before these whirlwinds thy sons, O Greece, shall be as chaff. Thirdly. Is the army actually engaged? God's "arrows shall go forth as lightning," so strongly, so suddenly, so irresistibly; his lightnings shall go forth as arrows: see Ps. xviii. 14. He sent out his arrows, and scattered them; that is, he shot out his lightnings and discomfited them. This alludes to that which God had done for Israel of old, when he brought them out of Egypt and into Canaan, and had its accomplishment partly in the wonderful successes which the Jews had against their neighbours that attacked them in the time of the Maccabees, by the special appearances of the Divine providence for them, and perfectly in the glorious victories gained by the cross of Christ, and the preaching of the cross, over Satan and all the powers of darkness, whereby we are made more than conquerors. Fourthly. Are they in danger of being overpowered by the enemy? "The Lord of hosts shall defend them," ver. 15; "The Lord their God shall save them," ver. 16; so that their enemies shall not prevail over them or prey upon them. God shall be unto them for defence as well as offence, the shield of their help as well as the sword of their excellency, and this as the Lord of hosts, who has power to defend them, and as their God, who is engaged by promise to defend them, and by the property he has in them. He shall save them in that day, that critical, dangerous day, as the flock of his people, with the same care and tenderness that the shepherd protects his sheep with. Those are safe whom God saves. Fifthly. Did their enemies hope to swallow them up? It shall be turned upon them, and they shall devour their enemies, and shall "subdue with sling-stones," for want of better weapons, those that come forth against them. The stones of the brook, when God pleaseth, shall do as great execution as the best train of artillery; for the stars in their courses shall fight on the same side. Goliath was subdued with a sling-stone. Having subdued they shall devour, shall drink the blood of their enemies, as it were, and, as conquerors use to do, they shall "make a noise, as through wine." It is usual for conquerors with loud huzzas and acclamations to glory in their victories, and proclaim them. We read of those that shout for mastery, and of the shout of a king among God's people. They shall be filled with blood and spoil, as the bowls and basins of the temple, or the corners of the altar, were used to be filled with the blood of the sacrifices; for their enemies shall fall as victims to Divine justice.

2. They shall triumph in their God. They shall take the comfort, and give God the glory, of their successes; so some read ver. 15. They shall eat, that is, they shall quietly enjoy what they have got; God will give them power to eat of it, after they have subdued the sling-stones, that is, their enemies that slung stones at them; and "they shall drink and make a noise," a joyful noise before the Lord, their Maker and Protector, "as through wine," as men use to be merry at a banquet of wine. "Being not drunk with wine, wherein is excess," but "filled with the Spirit," they shall speak to themselves and one another in "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs," as those that are drunk do with vain and foolish songs, Eph. v. 18, 19. And in the fulness of their joy they shall offer abundance of sacrifices to the honour of God, so that they shall both fill the bowls and the corners of the altar with the fat and blood of their sacrifices. And when they thus triumph in their successes their joy shall terminate in God as their God, the God of their salvation. They shall triumph,

1st. In the love he has for them, and the relation wherein they stand to him; that they are "the flock of his people," and he is their Shepherd; and that they are to him "as the stones of a crown," which are very precious, and of great value, and which are kept under a strong guard. Never was any king so pleased with the jewels of his crown as God is and will be with his people that are near and dear unto him, and in whom he glories. They are a crown of glory, and a royal diadem in his hand, Isa. lxii. 2, 3; and "they shall be mine, saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my jewels," Mal. iii. 17; and "they shall be lifted up as an ensign upon his land," as the royal standard is displayed in token of triumph and joy. God's people are his glory, so he is pleased to make them, so he is pleased to reckon them. He sets them as a banner upon his own land, waging war against those that hate him, to whom it is a flag of defiance, and a centre of unity to all that love him, to all the children of God that are scattered abroad, who are invited to come and enlist themselves under this banner, Isa. xi. 10, 11.

2nd. In the provision he makes for them, ver. 15. This is the matter of their triumph; ver. 17, "For how great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty!" This is the substance, this the burthen, of the songs wherewith they shall make a noise before the Lord. We are here taught, First. To admire and praise the amiableness of God's being. How great is his beauty! All the perfections of God's nature conspire to make him infinitely lovely in the eyes of all that know him. They are to him as the stones of a crown, but what is he to them? Our business in the temple is to "behold the beauty of the Lord," Ps. xxvii. 4; and how great is that beauty! How far doth it transcend all other beauties, particularly the beauty of his holiness. This may refer to the Messiah, to "Zion's King that cometh," (see "that King in his beauty," Isa. xxxiii. 17,) who is "fairer than the children of men," the "fairest of ten thousand," and "altogether lovely." Though in the eye of the world he had no form or comeliness, in the eye of faith how great is his beauty! Secondly. To admire and give thanks for the gifts of God's favour and grace, his bounty as well as his beauty; for "how great is his goodness!" How rich in mercy is he! How deep, how full are its springs! How various, how plenteous, how precious are its streams! What a great deal of good doth God do! How rich in mercy is he! Here is an instance of his goodness to his people: "Corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids;" that is, God will bless his people with an abundance of the fruits of the earth. Whereas they had been afflicted with scarcity to that degree that the young men and the maidens were ready to swoon and faint away for hunger and thirst, Lam. ii. 12, 21; iv. 7, 8; v. 10; now they shall have bread enough and to spare; not water only, but wine, new wine, which shall make the young people grow and be cheerful; and (which some have observed to be the effect of plenty and the cheapness of corn) the poor will be encouraged to marry and repeople the land, when they shall have wherewithal to maintain their families. Note, What good gifts God bestows upon us we must serve him cheerfully with them, and must trace the streams up to the fountain, and when we are refreshed with corn and wine must say, "How great is his goodness!"

CHAPTER X.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the chapter before, to encourage the Jews that were returned with hope that though they had been under Divine rebukes, for their negligence in rebuilding the temple, and were now surrounded with enemies and dangers, yet that God would do them good, and make them prosperous at home and victorious abroad. Now, I. They are here directed to eye the great God in all events that were concerning them, and, both in the evils they suffered and the comforts they desired, to acknowledge his hand, ver. 1—4. II. They are encouraged to expect strength and success from him in all their struggles with the enemies of their church and state, and to hope that the issue would be glorious at last, ver. 5—12.

ASK ye of the LORD rain in the time of the latter rain;
So the LORD shall make bright clouds,
And give them showers of rain,
To every one grass in the field.
2 For the idols have spoken vanity,
And the diviners have seen a lie,
And have told false dreams; they comfort in vain:
Therefore they went their way as a flock,
They were troubled, because there was no shepherd.
3 Mine anger was kindled against the shepherds,
And I punished the goats: [Judah,
For the LORD of hosts hath visited his flock the house of
And hath made them as his goodly horse in the battle.
4 Out of him came forth the corner,
Out of him the nail,
Out of him the battle bow,
Out of him every oppressor together.

Gracious things and glorious ones, very glorious and very gracious, were promised to this poor afflicted people in the foregoing chapter; now here he intimates to them that he will, for these things, be inquired of by them, and that he expects they should acknowledge him in all their ways, and in all his ways towards them,—him, and not idols that were rivals with him for their respects.

First. He directs them to apply themselves to God by prayer for rain in the season thereof. He had promised in the close of the foregoing chapter that there should be great plenty of corn and wine, whereas for several years, by reason of unseasonable weather, there had been great scarcity of both; but the earth will not yield its fruits unless the heavens water it, and therefore they must look up to God for the dew of heaven, in order to the fatness and fruitfulness of the earth; ver. 1, "Ask ye of the Lord rain." Do not pray to the clouds or to the stars for rain, but to the Lord, for he it is that hears the heavens when they hear the earth, Hos. ii. 21. Seasonable rain is a great mercy, which we must ask of God; "rain in the time of the latter rain," when there is most need of it. The former rain fell at the seed time, in autumn; the latter fell in the spring, between March and May, which brought the corn to an ear and filled it. If either of these rains failed it was very bad with that land, for from the end of May to September they never had any rain at all. Jerome, who lived in Judæa, saith he never saw any rain there in June or July. They are directed to ask for it in the time when it used to come. Note, We must in our prayers dutifully attend the course of providence, ask for mercies in their proper time, and not expect that God should go out of his usual way and method for us. But since sometimes God denied rain in the usual time, as a token of his displeasure, they must pray for it then as a token of his favour, and they shall not pray in vain. Ask, and it shall be given you; "So the Lord shall make bright clouds," which, though they are without rain themselves, yet are presages of rain; 'lightnings,' so the margin reads it, for he maketh lightnings for the rain. He will "give them showers of rain" in great abundance, and so give "to every one grass in the field;" for God is universally good, "and makes his rain to fall upon the just and the unjust."

Secondly. He shews them the folly of making their addresses to idols as their fathers had done; ver. 2, "The idols have spoken vanity;" the teraphim, which they courted and consulted in their distress, were so far from being able to command rain for them, that they could not so much as tell them when they should have rain. They pretended to promise them rain at such a time, but it did not come. The diviners, that were the prophets of those idols, have seen a lie; their visions were all a cheat and a sham, and "they have told false dreams," such as the event did not answer, which proved that they were not from God. Thus they comforted in vain those that consulted the lying oracles; all the vanities of the heathen put together could not give rain, Jer. xiv. 22. Yet this was not the worst of it: they not only got nothing by the false gods, but they lost the favour of the true God; for "therefore they went their way" into captivity, "as a flock" driven into the fold, and "they were troubled" with one vexation after another, as scattered sheep use to be, "because there was no shepherd," no prince to rule them, no priest to intercede for them, none to take care of them, and keep them together. They that wandered after strange gods were made to wander into strange nations.

Thirdly. He shews them the hand of God in all the events that were concerning them, both those that made against them and those that made for them, ver. 3. Let them consider, 1. When everything went cross it was God that walked contrary to them; ver. 3, "Mine anger was kindled against the shepherds" that should have fed the flock, but neglected it, and starved it. I was displeased at the wicked magistrates and ministers, the idol shepherds. The captivity in Babylon was a token of God's anger against them; in it likewise he punished the goats, those of the flock that were filthy and mischievous; they were set on the left hand to go away into punishment. Though the body of the nation suffered in the captivity, yet it was only the goats and the shepherds that God was angry with, and that he punished; the same affliction to others came from the love of God, and was but a fatherly chastisement, which to them came from his wrath, and was a judicial punishment. 2. When things began to change for the better it was God that gave them the happy turn. He has now visited his flock with favour, to inquire after them, and provide what he finds proper for them, and he has made them "as his goodly horse in the battle," has beautified them, taken care of them, managed and made use of them, as a man doth the horse he rides on; has made them valuable in themselves, and formidable to those about them, as his goodly horse. It is God that makes us what we are, and it is with us as he appoints.

Fourthly. He shews them that every creature is to them what God makes it to be; ver. 4, "Out of him came forth the corner, out of him the nail." 1. All the power that was engaged against them was from God. Out of him came all the combined force of their enemies, every oppressor together (and the oppressors of Israel were not a few) did but what his hand and his counsel determined before to be done; nor could they have had such power against them unless it had been given them from above. 2. All the power likewise that was engaged for them was derived from him, and depended on him. Out of him came forth the corner stone of the building, the power of magistrates, which keeps the several parts of the state together; princes are often called the corners of the people, as 1 Sam. xiv. 38. Out of him came forth the nail that fixeth the state, the "nail in the sure place," Isa. xxii. 23; the "nail in his holy place," Ezr. ix. 8. Out of him came forth the battle bow, the military power, and out of him every oppressor, or exactor, that has the civil power in his hand; and therefore to God, the fountain of power, we must always have an eye, and see every man's judgment proceeding from him.

5 And they shall be as mighty men,
Which tread down their enemies in the mire of the streets in the battle:
And they shall fight, because the LORD is with them,
And the riders on horses shall be confounded.
6 And I will strengthen the house of Judah,
And I will save the house of Joseph,
And I will bring them again to place them;
For I have mercy upon them:
And they shall be as though I had not cast them off:
For I am the LORD their God, and will hear them.
7 And they of Ephraim shall be like a mighty man,
And their heart shall rejoice as through wine:
Yea, their children shall see it, and be glad;
Their heart shall rejoice in the LORD.
8 I will hiss for them, and gather them;
For I have redeemed them:
And they shall increase as they have increased.
9 And I will sow them among the people:
And they shall remember me in far countries;
And they shall live with their children, and turn again.
10 I will bring them again also out of the land of Egypt,
And gather them out of Assyria;
And I will bring them into the land of Gilead and Lebanon;
And place shall not be found for them.
11 And he shall pass through the sea with affliction,
And shall smite the waves in the sea,
And all the deeps of the river shall dry up:
And the pride of Assyria shall be brought down,
And the sceptre of Egypt shall depart away.
12 And I will strengthen them in the LORD;
And they shall walk up and down in his name, saith the LORD.

Here are divers precious promises made to the people of God, which look farther than to the state of the Jews in the latter days of their church, and have certain reference to the spiritual Israel of God, the gospel church, and all true believers.

First. They shall have God's favour and presence, and shall be owned and accepted of him. This is the foundation of all the rest, "The Lord is with them," ver. 5. He espouses their cause, takes their part, is on their side, and if he be for them who can be against them? Again, ver. 6, "I have mercy upon them." All their dignity and joy is owing purely to God's mercy; and mercy, as it supposeth misery, so it excludes merit. They had been cast off, the effect of which could not but be misery; they had been justly cast off, and therefore could pretend to merit nothing at God's hand but wrath and the curse, yet it is promised, "They shall be as though I had not cast them off." The transgressions of their fathers, for which they had been rejected, shall not only not be visited upon them, but they shall not be so much as remembered against them. God will be as perfectly reconciled to them as if he had never contended with them, and the falling out of these lovers shall rather be the renewing than the weakening of love. They shall have such a full assurance of God's being reconciled to them, and upon that shall be so well reconciled to themselves, that they shall be as easy as if they had never been cast off; and their condition after their restoration to the Divine favour shall be so very happy that there shall not remain the least scar from the wounds which were given them by their being cast off. Such favour doth God shew to returning repenting sinners, that were by nature at a distance, and children of wrath; such fellowship are they admitted into, and such freedom doth he use with them, that they are as though they had never been cast off. 1. The covenant they are admitted into is the same that ever it was; "I am the Lord their God," according to the original contract, the covenant made with their fathers. 2. The communion they are admitted into is the same that ever it was; "I will hear them." They shall be as welcome as ever to speak to him, and as sure as ever to receive from him an answer of peace, for, as he never did, so he never will, say to Jacob's seed, "Seek ye me in vain."

Secondly. They shall be victorious over their enemies, that would draw them from either their duties to God or their comfort in God; ver. 5, "They shall be as mighty men," that are strong in body and bold in spirit, men of vigour, men of valour, effective men; they of Ephraim, as well as they of Judah, shall be "like a mighty man," ver. 7, that dares go about a difficult enterprise, and is able to go through with it. They shall, as mighty men, "tread down their enemies in the battle," as the dirt that is thrown out of the houses is trodden with other dirt "in the mire of the streets." And they shall therefore "fight because the Lord is with them." Some would argue, they shall therefore sit still and do nothing, because the Lord is with them that can and will do all. No, God's gracious presence with us to help us must not supersede, but quicken and animate, our endeavours to help ourselves; and we must therefore "work out our salvation with fear and trembling," because it is God that works in us both to will and to do. They fight with readiness and resolution, because, if God be with them, they are sure to be conquerors, more than conquerors; for then "the riders on horses shall be confounded." The cavalry of the enemies shall be routed and put into disorder by the infantry of the Jews. The preachers of the Gospel of Christ went forth to war a good warfare: they charged bravely because God was with them; and the riders on horses that opposed them were confounded, for God chose the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty. But whence have they all this might? How come they to be so able, so active? It is in the Lord, and in the power of his might, that they are so; ver. 6, "I will strengthen the house of Judah," and so "I will save the house of Joseph." Note, God saves us by strengthening us, and works out our happiness by working in us to do our duty. And thus we are engaged to the utmost diligence in using the strength God gives us, and yet when all is done God must have the glory of all. God is our strength, and so becomes both our song and our salvation.

Thirdly. Those of them that are dispersed shall be gathered together into one body; ver. 6, "I will bring them again to place them," bring them from other lands to place them in their own land. This was a token of their being perfectly restored to all their other ancient privileges—they shall be restored to the possession of their own land. This was fulfilled when "the children of God that were scattered abroad" were by faith in Christ incorporated in the gospel church, and Jews and Gentiles became one fold, Jno. x. 16. In order to this, ver. 8, I will hiss for them, or, rather, whistle for them, as the shepherd with his pipe calls his sheep together that know his voice, and so "I will gather them." The preaching of the Gospel was, as it were, God's hissing for souls to come to Jesus Christ, his calling in his scattered sheep to the green pastures. "I will gather them, for I have redeemed them." Note, Whom Christ has redeemed by his blood God will gather by his grace, as a hen gathers her brood under her wings. This promise is enlarged upon, ver. 10, "I will bring them again also out of the land of Egypt." Some think this was literally fulfilled when Ptolemeus Philadelphus, king of Egypt, sent a hundred and twenty thousand Jews out of his country into their own land, as was the promise of gathering them out of Assyria by Alexander the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. But it has its spiritual accomplishment in the gathering in of precious souls out of a bondage worse than that in Egypt or Assyria, and bringing of them into the glorious liberties of the children of God, and their enjoyments, which are as the beautiful fruitful pastures in "the land of Gilead and Lebanon." All the land of promise is theirs, even Gilead, the utmost border of it eastward, and Lebanon, the utmost border northward. But how shall this be? How shall a people so dispersed be got together? How shall they that are set at such a distance from their own country be brought to it again? It is true the difficulties seem insuperable, but they shall be got over as easily, as effectually, as those that lay in the way of their deliverance out of Egypt, and their entrance into Canaan. "He shall pass through the sea with affliction," as of old through the Red Sea, to the sore affliction of Pharaoh and his hosts, or to the sore affliction of the sea, the waves whereof he shall smite, so that it shall be driven back, as then "the sea saw and fled," Ps. cxiv. 3. And all the deeps of the river, all the rivers, though never so deep, shall dry up, as Jordan did to make way for Israel's passage into that good land which God had given them. Doth the pride of Assyria stand in the way of their deliverance? He shall give check to it that sets bounds to "the proud waves of the sea," and it "shall be brought down." Doth the sceptre of Egypt oppose it? That shall depart away, so that it shall not be able to obstruct the gathering in of God's Israel, when his time is come for the doing of it. When the gospel church was to be gathered out of all nations by the preaching of the Gospel, great opposition was given to it by the enraged combined powers of earth and hell; insuperable difficulties seemed to be in the way of it; but, by a Divine power going along with the doctrine of Christ, it became mighty to the pulling down of strongholds, and the conversion and salvation of thousands. Then the sea fled, and Jordan was "driven back at the presence of the Lord."

Fourthly. They shall greatly multiply, and the church, that new world, shall be replenished; ver. 8, "They shall increase as they have increased" formerly in Egypt, and great additions shall be made to their numbers, as in the days of David and Solomon. When God gathers his redeemed ones to himself they shall help to gather in others with them, and their motion homewards shall be like that of a snowball; crescit eundo,—'the farther it goes the larger it grows by accretion.' "I will gather them, and they shall increase." Note, The church of Christ is a growing body, as long as it is in the present state of minority, till it comes "to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." There are "added to it daily such as shall be saved." 1. It shall spread to distant places. It shall fill Canaan, even to the lands of Gilead and Lebanon, so that no more place, no more room, shall be found for it there, ver. 10. In Judah only God had been known, and his name great in Israel only. Here only he revealed his statutes and judgments, but in gospel times that place shall be quite too strait; the church's tent must be enlarged, and its cords lengthened; then "I will sow them among the people," ver. 9. Their scattering shall be like the scattering of seed in the ground, not to bury it, but to increase it, that it may bring forth much fruit. The Jews are said to be dispersed "into every nation under heaven," Acts ii. 5; and as it was their troubles that dispersed some of them, so perhaps others transplanted themselves into colonies, because the land of Israel was too strait for them; and many were natives of other nations, but proselyted to the Jewish religion. Now these were "sown among the people," Hos. ii. 23; and this contributed very much to the spreading of the Gospel. The Jews that came from all parts to worship at Jerusalem fetched thence the gospel light and fire to their own countries, as those, Acts ii., and the eunuch, Acts viii. And their synagogues in the several cities of the Gentiles were the first receptacles of the apostles, and their preaching, wherever they came. Thus, when God sowed them among the people, that they might not get hurt by the Gentiles, but do good to them, he took care that they should remember him, and make mention of his name in far countries; and by keeping up the knowledge of God among them as he had revealed himself in the Old Testament, they would be the more ready to admit the knowledge of Christ as he has revealed himself in the New Testament. 2. It shall last to future ages. The church shall not be res unius ætatis,—'a temporary thing,' but a seed in it shall serve the Lord; ver. 7, "Yea, their children shall see it and be glad;" and ver. 9, "They shall live with their children, and turn again." Converts to Christ shall have their children about them, whom they shall teach the knowledge of the Lord, and bring with them when they turn again to the holy land and the way of holiness. It was said to those to whom the Gospel was first preached, "The promise is to you and to your children," Acts ii. 39. They shall be so sown among the people as never to be extirpated. Christ's family upon earth shall never be extinct, nor his purchased possession lost for want of heirs.

Fifthly. God himself will be both their strength and their song. 1. In him they shall be comforted, and shall have abundant satisfaction; ver. 7, "Their heart shall rejoice as through wine;" for Christ's love, which is their joy, is better than wine. They shall be "like a mighty man," and "their heart shall rejoice." When we resolutely resist, and so overcome, our spiritual enemies, then our hearts shall rejoice. But we ruin our own joy if our resistance be feeble, and we yield to the temptations of Satan. Their heart shall rejoice, and then they shall be as a mighty man, for the joy of the Lord will be our strength. And with their graces their joys shall be propagated. "Their children shall see it and be glad, and their hearts" also "shall rejoice in the Lord." It is good to acquaint children betimes with the delights of religion, and to make the services of it as pleasant as may be to them, that, learning betimes to rejoice in the Lord, they may with purpose of heart cleave to him. 2. By him they shall be carried on with vigour and enlargement of heart in his service; ver. 12, "I will strengthen them in the Lord," strengthen them for their walk and work, as well as for their warfare. It is the God of Israel that "gives strength and power unto his people," that strengthens all their powers and faculties for spiritual performances, above what they are by nature, and against what they are by the corruption of nature. Now observe, 1st. How they are thus enabled and invigorated for their duty. "I" the Lord "will strengthen them in the Lord," in the Messiah, who is Jehovah our strength, as well as Jehovah our righteousness. Strength is treasured up for us in Christ, and from him it is derived to us. It is through Christ strengthening us that we can do all things, and without him we can do nothing. His strength is commanded him for this purpose, Ps. lxviii. 28. 2nd. What good use they shall make of this strength given unto them. "They shall walk up and down in his name." If God strengthen us, we must bestir ourselves; must walk up and down in all the duties of the Christian life; must be active and busy in the work of God; must walk up and down as industrious men do, losing no time, and letting slip no opportunity. But still we must walk up and down in the name of Christ, must do all by warrant from him, and in dependence on him, with an eye to his word as our rule and his glory as our end. To us to live must be Christ; and, whatever we do in word or deed, we must "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus," that we receive not the strengthening grace of God in vain: see Ps. lxxx. 17, 18.

CHAPTER XI.

God's prophet, that in the chapters before was an ambassador sent to promise peace, is here a herald sent to proclaim war. The Jewish nation shall recover its prosperity, and shall flourish for some time, and become considerable; it shall be very happy at length in the coming of the long-expected Messiah, in the preaching of his Gospel, and the setting up of the standard there. But when thereby the chosen remnant among them are effectually called in, and united to Christ, the body of the nation, persisting in unbelief, shall be utterly abandoned, and given up to ruin for rejecting Christ, and that is it that is foretold here in this chapter—the Jews rejecting Christ, which was the measure-filling sin, and the wrath which for that sin came upon them to the uttermost. Here is, I. A prediction of the destruction itself that should come upon the Jewish nation, ver. 1—3. II. The putting of it into the hands of the Messiah: 1. He is charged with the custody of that flock, ver. 4—6; 2. He undertakes it, and bears rule in it, ver. 7, 8; 3. Finding it perverse, he gives it up, ver. 9; breaks his shepherd's staff, ver. 10, 11; resents the indignities done him, and the contempt put upon him, ver. 12, 13, and then breaks his other staff, ver. 14; 4. He turns them over into the hands of foolish shepherds, who, instead of preventing, shall complete their ruin, and both the blind leaders and the blind followers shall fall together into the ditch, ver. 15—17. This is foretold to the poor of the flock before it comes to pass, that when it doth come to pass they may not be offended.

OPEN thy doors, O Lebanon,
That the fire may devour thy cedars.
2 Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen;
Because the mighty are spoiled:
Howl, O ye oaks of Bashan;
For the forest of the vintage is come down.
3 There is a voice of the howling of the shepherds;
For their glory is spoiled:
A voice of the roaring of young lions;
For the pride of Jordan is spoiled.

In dark and figurative expressions, as is usual in the Scripture predictions of things at a great distance, that destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish church and nation, is here foretold, which our Lord Jesus, when the time was at hand, prophesied of very plainly and expressly. We have here,

First. Preparation made for that destruction; ver. 1, "Open thy doors, O Lebanon." Thou wouldst not open them to let thy king in; he "came to his own, and his own received him not;" now thou must open them to let thy ruin in. Let the gates of the forest and all the avenues of it be thrown open, and let the fire come in and devour its glory. Some by Lebanon here understand the temple, which was built of cedars from Lebanon, and the stones of it white as the snow of Lebanon. It was burnt with fire by the Romans, and its gates were forced open by the fury of the soldiers. To confirm this, they tell a story, that forty years before the destruction of the second temple the gates of it opened of their own accord; upon which prodigy, Rabbi Johanan made this remark, (as it is found in one of the Jewish authors,) Now I know, said he, that the destruction of the temple is at hand, according to the prophecy of Zechariah, "Open thy gates, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars." Others understand it of Jerusalem, or rather of the whole land of Canaan, to which Lebanon was an inlet on the north. All shall lie open to the invader, and the cedars, the mighty and eminent men, shall be devoured, which cannot but alarm those of an inferior rank, ver. 2. If the cedars are fallen, that is, if all the mighty are spoiled and brought to ruin, let the fir-tree howl. How can the slender fir-trees stand, if stately cedars fall? If cedars are devoured by fire, it is time for the fir-trees to howl; for no wood is so combustible as that of the fir. And let the oaks of Bashan, that lie exposed to every injury, howl, for the forest of the vintage, or the flourishing vineyard, that used to be guarded with a particular care, is come down. Or, as some read it, when the defenced forests, such as Lebanon was, are come down. Note, The falls of the wise and good into sin, and the falls of the rich and great into trouble, are loud alarms to those that are every way their inferiors, not to be secure.

Secondly. Lamentation made for the destruction; ver. 3, "There is a voice of howling." Those that are fallen howl for grief and shame, and those who see their own turn coming howl for fear. But the great men especially receive the alarm with the utmost confusion. Those that were roaring in the day of their revels and triumphs are howling in the day of their terrors; for now they are tormented more than others. Those great men were by office shepherds, and such should have protected God's flock committed to their charge, (it is the duty both of princes and priests;) but they were as young lions, that made themselves a terror to the flock with their roarings, and the flock a prey to themselves with their tearing. Note, It is sad with a people when those that should be as shepherds to them are as young lions to them. But what is the issue? The shepherds howl, for their glory is spoiled. Their pastures, and the flocks that covered them, which were the glory of the swains, are laid waste. The young lions howl, for "the pride of Jordan is spoiled." The pride of Jordan was the thickets on the banks, in which the lions reposed themselves; and therefore, when the river overflowed and spoiled them, the lions came up from them, as we read, Jer. xlix. 19, and they came up roaring. Note, When those that have power proudly abuse their power, and, instead of being shepherds, are as young lions, they may expect that the righteous God will humble their pride and break their power.

4 Thus saith the LORD my God;
Feed the flock of the slaughter;
5 Whose possessors slay them,
And hold themselves not guilty:
And they that sell them say,
Blessed be the LORD; for I am rich:
And their own shepherds pity them not.
6 For I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land,
saith the LORD:
But, lo, I will deliver the men every one
Into his neighbour's hand, and into the hand of his king:
And they shall smite the land,
And out of their hand I will not deliver them.
7 And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you,
O poor of the flock. And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock. 8 Three shepherds also I cut off in one month; and my soul lothed them, and their soul also abhorred me. Then said I,

I will not feed you:
That that dieth,
Let it die;
And that that is to be cut off,
Let it be cut off;
And let the rest eat every one the flesh of another.

10 And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people. 11 And it was broken in that day: and so the poor of the flock that waited upon me knew that it was the word of the LORD. 12 And I said unto them, If ye think good, give me my price; and if not, forbear. So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver. 13 And the LORD said unto me, Cast it unto the potter: a goodly price that I was prised at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to the potter in the house of the LORD. 14 Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel.

The prophet here is made a type of Christ, as the prophet Isaiah sometimes was; and the scope of these verses is to shew that "for judgment Christ came into the world," Jno. ix. 39; for judgment to the Jewish church and nation, which were, about the time of his coming, wretchedly corrupted and degenerated, by the worldliness and hypocrisy of their rulers. Christ would have healed them, but they would not be healed; they are therefore left desolate, and abandoned to ruin. Observe here,

First. The desperate case of the Jewish church under the tyranny of their own governors. Their slavery in their own country made them as miserable as their captivity in strange countries had done. "Their possessors slay them and sell them," ver. 5. In Zechariah's time we find the rulers and the nobles justly rebuked for exacting usury of their brethren; and the governors, even by their servants, oppressive to the people, Neh. v. 7, 15. In Christ's time the chief priests and the elders, that were the possessors of the flock, by their traditions, the commandments of men, and their impositions on the consciences of the people, became perfect tyrants, devoured their houses, engrossed their wealth, and fleeced the flock instead of feeding it. The Sadducees, that were deists, corrupted their judgments; the Pharisees, that were bigots for superstition, corrupted their morals, by making void the commandments of God, Mat. xv. 6. Thus they slew the sheep of the flock, thus they sold them. They cared not what became of them, so they could but gain their own ends, and serve their own interests. And,

1. In this they justified themselves. They slay them, and hold themselves not guilty. They think there is no harm in it, and that they shall never be called to an account for it by the chief Shepherd: as if their power were given them for destruction, which was designed only for edification; and as if, because they sat in Moses' seat, they were not under the obligation of Moses' law, but might dispense with it, and with themselves in the breach of it, at their pleasure. Note, Those have their minds wofully blinded indeed that do ill, and justify themselves in it. But God will not hold them guiltless who hold themselves so.

2. In this they affronted God, by giving him thanks for the gain of their oppression. They said, "Blessed be the Lord, for I am rich;" as if because they prospered in their wickedness, got money by it, and raised estates, God had made himself patron of their unjust practices, and Providence was become particeps criminis,—'the associate of their guilt.' What is got honestly we ought to give God thanks for, and to bless him whose blessing makes rich, and adds no sorrow with it. But with what face can we go to God, either to beg a blessing upon the unlawful methods of getting wealth, or to return him thanks for success in them? They should rather have gone to God to confess the sin, to take shame to themselves for it, and to vow restitution, than thus to mock him by making the gains of sin the gift of God, who hates robbery for burnt offerings, and reckons not himself praised by the thanksgiving, if he be dishonoured either in the getting or in the using of that which we give him thanks for.

3. In this they put contempt upon the people of God, as unworthy their regard or compassionate consideration. "Their own shepherds pity them not," they make them miserable, and then do not commiserate them. Christ had "compassion on the multitude, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad, as if they had no shepherd," as really they had worse than none; but "their own shepherds pitied them not," nor shewed any concern for them. Note, It is ill for a church when its pastors have no tenderness, no compassion for precious souls; when they can look upon the ignorant, the foolish, the wicked, the weak, without pity.

Secondly. The sentence of God's wrath passed upon them for their senselessness and stupidity in this condition. There was a general decay, nay, a destruction of religion among them; and it was all one to them, they regarded it not: "My people love to have it so," Jer. v. 31. Though they were "oppressed and broken in judgment," yet they "willingly walked after the commandment," Hos. v. 11. And their shepherds pitied them not, so they did not bemoan themselves; therefore God saith, ver. 7, "I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land." They have courted their own destruction, and so let their doom be. But those are truly miserable whom the God of mercy himself will no more have compassion upon. They that are willing to have their consciences oppressed by those that teach for doctrines the commandments of men, as the Jews were, who called them Rabbi, Rabbi, that did so, Mat. xv. 9, xxiii. 7, are often punished by oppression in their civil interests, and justly, for they forfeit their own rights who tamely give up God's rights. The Jews did so, the papists do so; and who can pity them if they be ruled with rigour? God here threatens them,

1. That he will deliver them into the hand of oppressors, "every one into his neighbour's hand," so that they shall use one another barbarously. The several parties in Jerusalem did so. The zealots, the seditious, as they were called, committed greater outrages than the common enemy did, as Josephus relates in his history of the wars of the Jews. They shall be delivered every one "into the hands of his king," that is, the Roman emperor, whom they chose to submit to rather than to Christ, saying, "We have no king but Cæsar." Thus they thought to ingratiate themselves with their lords and masters. But for this God brought the Romans upon them, who "took away their place and nation."

2. That he will not deliver them out of their hands. "They shall smite their land," the whole land, and "out of their hand I will not deliver them." And if the Lord do not help them, none else can, nor can they help themselves.

Thirdly. Trial yet made whether their ruin might be prevented by sending Christ among them as a shepherd. God hath sent his servants to them in vain, "but last of all he sent unto them his Son, saying, They will reverence my Son," Mat. xxi. 37. Divers of the prophets had spoken of him as the Shepherd of Israel, Isa. xl. 11; Eze. xxxiv. 23. He himself told the Pharisees that he was the Shepherd of the sheep, and that they who pretended to be shepherds were thieves and robbers, Jno. x. 1, 2, 11, where he seems to refer to this here, where we have,

1. The charge he received from his Father to try what might be done with this flock; ver. 4, "Thus saith the Lord my God," (Christ called his Father his God, because he acted in compliance with his will, and with an eye to his glory in his whole undertaking,) "Feed the flock of the slaughter." The Jews were God's flock, but they were the flock of slaughter, for their enemies had killed them all the day long, and "accounted them as sheep for the slaughter." Their own possessors slew them, and God himself had doomed them to the slaughter; yet, Feed them by reproof, instruction, and comfort, provide wholesome food for them who have so long been soured with the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees. "Other sheep he had, which were not of his fold," and which afterwards must be brought, but he is first "sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," Mat. xv. 24.

2. His acceptance of this charge, and his undertaking pursuant to it, ver. 7. He doth, as it were, say, Lo, "I come to do thy will, O my God!" and since this is thy will it is mine, "I will feed the flock of slaughter." Christ will have a care for these lost sheep; he will go about among them, teaching and "healing even you, O poor of the flock." Christ did not neglect the meanest, or overlook them for their meanness. The shepherds that made a prey of them regarded not the poor, they were conversant with those only that they could get by, but Christ preached his Gospel to the poor, Mat. xi. 5. It was an instance of his humiliation that his converse was mostly with the inferior sort of people; his disciples, that were his constant attendants, were of the poor of the flock.

3. His furnishing himself with tools proper for the charge he had undertaken; "I took unto me two staves," pastoral staves. Other shepherds have but one crook, but Christ had two, noting the double care he had of his flock, and what he did both for the souls and for the bodies of men. David speaks of God's rod and his staff, Ps. xxiii. 4, a correcting rod and a supporting staff. One of these staves was called Beauty, noting the temple which is called the beauty of holiness, and one of its gates, Beautiful, which Christ called his Father's house, and for which he shewed a great zeal when he cleared it of the buyers and sellers; the other he called Bands, noting their civil state, and the incorporate society of that nation, which Christ also took care of by preaching love and peace among them. Christ in his Gospel, and in all he did among them, consulted the advancement both of their civil and of their sacred interests.

4. His execution of his office as the chief Shepherd; "He fed the flock," ver. 7, and he displaced those under-shepherds that were false to their trusts; ver. 8, "Three shepherds I cut off in one month." Through the deficiency and uncertainty of the history of the Jewish church in its latter ages, we know not what particular event this had its accomplishment in; in general, it seems to be an act of power and justice for the punishment of the sensual shepherds, and the redress of the grievances of the abused flock. Some understand it of the three orders of princes, priests, and scribes or prophets, who, when Christ had finished his work, were laid aside for their unfaithfulness; others, of the three sects among the Jews, of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, all whom Christ silenced in dispute, Mat. xxii., and soon after cut them off, all in a little time.

Fourthly. Their enmity to Christ, and making themselves odious to him. He came to his own, the sheep of his own pasture; it might have been expected that between them and him there would have been an entire affection, as between the shepherd and his sheep, but they carried themselves so ill that his soul loathed them,—was straitened towards them, so it may be read; he intended them kindness, but could not do them the kindness he intended them, because of their unbelief, Mat. xiii. 58. He was disappointed in them, discouraged concerning them, grieved for them; not only for the shepherds he cut off, but for the people, whom Christ often looked upon with grief in his heart and tears in his eyes. Their provocations even wore out his patience, and he was weary of that "faithless and perverse generation." "Their soul also it abhorred me," and therefore it was that his soul loathed them; for, whatever estrangement there is between God and man, it begins on man's side. The Jewish shepherds rejected this chief Shepherd, as the Jewish builders rejected this chief corner stone. They had indignation at Christ's doctrine and miracles, and his interest in the people, to whom they did all they could to make him odious, as they had made themselves odious to him. Note, There is a mutual enmity between God and wicked people; they are hateful to God and haters of God. Nothing speaks more the sinfulness and misery of an unregenerate state than this doth; the carnal mind, the friendship of the world, are enmity to God, and God hateth all the workers of iniquity; and it is easy to foresee what this will end in, if the quarrel be not taken up in time, Isa. xxvii. 4, 5.

Fifthly. Christ's rejecting them as incurable, and leaving them their house desolate, Mat. xxiii. 38. The things of their peace are now hid from their eyes, because they knew not the day of their visitation. Here we have,

1. The sentence of their rejection passed; ver. 8, "Then said I, I will not feed you." I will take no farther care of you, "you shall not see me again," take your own course. As I will not feed you, so I will not cure you; "that that dieth, let it die," the Shepherd will do nothing to save its forfeited life; that "that is to be cut off, let it be cut off;" that that will make itself a prey to the wolf, let it be a prey; and let the rest so far forget their own mild and gentle nature as to "eat the flesh one of another;" let these sheep fight like dogs. Those that reject Christ will be certainly and justly rejected by him, and then are miserable of course.

2. A sign of it given; ver. 10, "I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it in sunder," in token of this, that he would be no longer a shepherd to them. As the lord high steward determines his commission by breaking his white staff, and as Moses' breaking the tables of the law put a stop for the present to the treaty between God and Israel, the breaking of this staff signified the breaking of God's covenant which he had "made with all the people," the covenant of peculiarity made with all the tribes of Israel, and all other people that, by being proselyted to their religion, were incorporated into their nation. The Jewish church was now stripped of all its glory,—its crown was profaned and cast to the ground, and all its honour laid in the dust, for God is departed from it, and will no more own it for his. When Christ told them plainly that the kingdom of God should be taken from them and given to another people, then he broke the staff of beauty, Mat. xxi. 43. And it was broken in that day; though Jerusalem and the Jewish nation held up forty years longer, yet from that day we may reckon the staff of beauty broken, ver. 11. And though the great men did not, or would not, understand it as a Divine sentence, but thought to put it by with a cold "God forbid," Lu. xx. 16, yet the poor of the flock, the disciples of Christ that waited on him, and understood with what authority he spake, and could distinguish the voice of their Shepherd from that of a stranger, they "knew that it was the word of the Lord," and trembled at it, and were confident that it should not fall to the ground. Note, Christ is waited upon by the poor of the flock; he chose them to be with him, to be his pupils, to be his witnesses. The poor received him and his Gospel when those that had great possessions turned their backs upon him. And those that wait upon Christ, that sit at his feet to hear and receive his words, they shall "know of the doctrine whether it be of God," Jno. vii. 17.

3. A farther reason given for their rejection. It was said before, their souls abhorred him; and here we have an instance of it, their buying and selling him for thirty pieces of silver, either thirty Roman pence or rather thirty Jewish shekels. This is here foretold in somewhat obscure expressions, as it is fit such particular prophecies should be delivered, lest otherwise the plainness of the prophecy might prevent the accomplishment of it. Here, 1st. The Shepherd comes to them for his wages; ver. 12, "If ye think good, give me my price," you are weary of me, pay me off, and discharge me; "and if not, forbear:" if you be willing to continue me longer in your service, I will continue; or if to turn me off without wages, I am content. Christ was no hireling, and yet the labourer is worthy of his hire. Compare with this what Christ said to Judas, when he was going to sell him, "What thou doest do quickly;" be at a word with the chief priests, let them either take the bargain or leave it, Jno. xiii. 27. Those that betray Christ are not forced to it; they might have chosen. 2nd. They value him at thirty pieces of silver. Many years' service he had done them as a Shepherd, yet this is all they will now turn him off with; A goodly price that I with all my care and pains was valued at by them. If Judas fixed this sum in his demand, it is observable that his name was Judah, the same name with that of the body of the people, for it was a national act; or if (as rather it seems) the chief priests patched up this sum in their proffers, they were the representatives of the people; it was part of the priest's office to put a value upon the devoted things, Lev. xxvii. 8, and thus they valued the Lord Jesus. It was the ordinary price of a slave, Ex. xxi. 32. Making light of Christ, and undervaluing the love of that great and good Shepherd, is the ruin of multitudes, and justly so. 3rd. The silver being no way proportionable to his worth, it is thrown to the potter with disdain; let him take it to buy clay with, or for any use that a little money will serve to, for it is not worth hoarding; it may be enough for a potter's stock, but not for the pay of such a Shepherd, much less for his purpose. So the prophet "cast the thirty pieces of silver to the potter in the house of the Lord." Let him take them, and do what he will with them. Now we find a particular accomplishment of this in the history of Christ's sufferings, and reference is had to this prophecy, Mat. xxvii. 9, 10. Thirty pieces of silver was the very sum for which Christ was sold to the chief priests; the money, when Judas would not keep it, and the chief priests would not take it back, was laid out in the purchase of the "potter's field." Even that sudden resolve of the chief priests was according to an ancient prophecy, and the more ancient counsel and foreknowledge of God.

4. The completing of their rejection in the cutting asunder of the other staff, ver. 14. The former spoke the ruin of their church, by breaking the covenant between God and them, that defaced their beauty; this speaks the ruin of their state, by breaking the brotherhood between Judah and Israel, that is, by reviving animosities and contention among them, such as were of old between Judah and Israel, the righting of whom, as one stick in the hand of the Lord, was one of the blessings promised after their return out of captivity, Eze. xxxvii. 19. But that union shall now be dissolved; they shall be crumbled into parties and factions, exasperated one against another, and their kingdom, being thus divided, shall be brought to desolation. 1st. Nothing ruins a people so certainly, so inevitably, as the breaking of the staff of bands, and the weakening of the brotherhood among them; for hereby they become an easy prey to the common enemy. 2nd. This follows upon the dissolving of the covenant between God and them, and the decay of religion among them. When iniquity abounds love waxeth cold. No wonder if those fall out among themselves that have provoked God to fall out with them. When the staff of beauty is broken, the staff of bands will not hold long. An unchurched people will soon be an undone people.

15 And the LORD said unto me, Take unto thee yet the instruments of a foolish shepherd.
16 For, lo, I will raise up a shepherd in the land,
Which shall not visit those that be cut off,
Neither shall seek the young one,
Nor heal that that is broken,
Nor feed that that standeth still:
But he shall eat the flesh of the fat,
And tear their claws in pieces.
17 Woe to the idol shepherd that leaveth the flock!
The sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye:
His arm shall be clean dried up,
And his right eye shall be utterly darkened.

God having shewed the misery of his people in their being justly abandoned by the good Shepherd, here shews their farther misery in being shamefully abused by foolish shepherds. The prophet is himself to personate and represent this pretended shepherd; ver. 15, "Take unto thee instruments," or accoutrements, "of a foolish shepherd," that are no way fit for the business, such a shepherd's coat, and bag, and staff, as a foolish shepherd would appear in; for such a shepherd shall be set over them, ver. 16, that instead of protecting them shall oppress them, and do them mischief. 1. They shall be under the inspection of unfaithful ministers. Their scribes, and priests, and doctors of their law, shall bind heavy burthens upon them, and grievous to be borne; and with their traditions imposed shall make the ceremonial law much more a yoke than God had made it. The description here given of the foolish shepherd suits very well with the character Christ gives of the scribes and Pharisees, Mat. xxiii. 2. They shall be under the tyranny of unmerciful princes that shall rule them with rigour, and make their own land as much a house of bondage to them as ever Egypt or Babylon were. When they had rejected him by whom princes decree justice, it was just they should be turned over to them who decree unrighteous decrees. 3. They shall be imposed upon and deluded by false Christs and false prophets, as our Saviour foretold, Mat. xxiv. 5. Many such there were, who by their seditious practices provoked the Romans, and hastened the ruin of the Jewish nation; but it is observable they were never cheated by a counterfeit Messiah, till they had refused and rejected the true Messiah. Now observe,

First. What a curse this foolish shepherd should be to the people, ver. 16. God will for their punishment raise up a foolish shepherd, who will not do the duty of a shepherd; he will not "visit those that be cut off," nor go after those that go astray, or seek those that are missing, to find them out, and bring them home, as the good Shepherd doth, Mat. xviii. 12, 13. They take no care of the young ones, that need their care, and are well worthy of it, as Christ doth, Isa. xl. 11. They do not heal that which was broken, which was worried and torn, but let it die of its bruises, when a little thing in time would have saved it. They do not feed those that through weakness stand still, and are ready to faint and cannot get forward, but leave them behind, let who will take them up. They do not carry that which stands still, so some read it, never do any thing to support the weak, and comfort the feeble-minded; but on the contrary, 1st. They are luxurious themselves. They eat of the flesh of the fat, they will have of the best for themselves; and, like that wicked servant that said, "My lord delays his coming," they "eat and drink with the drunken," and "serve their own bellies." 2. They are barbarous to the flock. Their passions are as ill governed as their appetites; for when they are in a rage against any of the flock they "tear their" very "claws in pieces," by overdriving them; they beat their hoofs; they "smite their fellow-servants." Woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is such a child!

Secondly. What a curse this foolish shepherd should bring upon himself; ver. 17, "Woe to the idol shepherd," that, like an idol, has eyes and sees not,—that, like an idol, receives abundance of respect and homage from the people, and the chiefest of their offerings, but neither can nor will do them any kindness. He leaves the flock when they most need his care,—leaves them destitute, and flees because he is a hireling; his doom is, that the sword of God's justice shall be upon his arm and his right eye, so that he shall quite lose the use of both. His arm shall wither and be dried up, so that he who would not help his friends when it was required, shall not know how to help himself; "his right eye shall be utterly darkened," that he shall not discern the danger that his flock is in, nor know which way to look for relief. This was fulfilled when Christ said to the Pharisees, "I am come, that they which see may be made blind," Jno. ix. 39. Those that have gifts which qualify them to do good, if they do not do good with them they shall be taken away from them. Those that should have been workmen, but were slothful and would do nothing, will justly have their arm dried up; and those that should have been watchmen, but were sleepy, and would never look about them, will justly have their eye blinded.

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle, Gal. iv. 25, 26, distinguished between Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children, the remaining carcass of the Jewish church that rejected Christ, and Jerusalem that is from above, that is free, and is the mother of us all,—the Christian church, the spiritual Jerusalem, which God has chosen to put his name there. In the chapter before we read the doom of the former, and left that carcass to be a prey to the eagles that should be gathered to it. Now in this chapter we have the blessings of the latter, many precious promises made to the gospel Jerusalem by him who, ver. 1, declares his power to make them good. It is promised, I. That the attempts of the church's enemies against her shall be to their own ruin, and they shall find it is at their peril if they do her any hurt, ver. 2—4, 6. II. That the endeavours of the church's friends and patrons for her good shall be pious, regular, and successful, ver. 5. III. That God will protect and strengthen the meanest and weakest that belong to his church, and work salvation for them, ver. 7, 8. IV. That as a preparative for all his mercy, and a pledge of it, he will pour upon them a spirit of prayer and repentance, the products of which shall be universal and very particular, ver. 9—14. These promises were of use then to the pious Jews that lived in the troublous times under Antiochus, and other persecutors and oppressors, and they are still to be improved in every age for the directing of our prayers, and the encouraging of our hopes, with reference to the gospel church.

THE burden of the word of the LORD for Israel,
Saith the LORD, which stretcheth forth the heavens,
And layeth the foundation of the earth,
And formeth the spirit of man within him.
2 Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling unto all the people round about,
When they shall be in the siege
Both against Judah and against Jerusalem.
3 And in that day will I make Jerusalem
A burdensome stone for all people:
All that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces,
Though all the people of the earth be gathered together
4 In that day, saith the LORD, [against it.
I will smite every horse with astonishment,
And his rider with madness:
And I will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah,
And will smite every horse of the people with blindness.
5 And the governors of Judah shall say in their heart,
The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be my strength
In the LORD of hosts their God.
6 In that day will I make the governors of Judah
Like an hearth of fire among the wood,
And like a torch of fire in a sheaf;
And they shall devour all the people round about,
On the right hand and on the left:
And Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place,
Even in Jerusalem.
7 The LORD also shall save the tents of Judah first,
That the glory of the house of David
And the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem
Do not magnify themselves against Judah. [Jerusalem;
8 In that day shall the LORD defend the inhabitants of
And he that is feeble among them at that day shall be as
And the house of David shall be as God, [David;
As the angel of the LORD before them.

Here is, First. The title of this charter of promises made to God's Israel. It is "the burden of the word of the Lord," a Divine prediction; it is of weight in the delivery of it; it is to be pressed upon the people, and will be very pressing in the accomplishment of it. It is a burthen, a heavy burthen to all the church's enemies, like that talent of lead, ch. v. 7, 8; but it is for Israel,—it is for their comfort and benefit. As even the fiery law, Deu. xxxiii. 2, so the fiery prophecies and fiery providences that come from God's right hand, come for them. The word that speaks terror to their enemies speaks peace to them; as the pillar of cloud and fire which turned a bright side towards the Israelites to direct and encourage them, but a black side towards the Egyptians to terrify and dispirit them. Happy they that have even the burthens of God's word for them, as well as the blessings of it.

Secondly. The title of him that grants this charter, which is prefixed to it, to shew that he hath both authority to make these promises and ability to make them good; for he is the Creator of the world, and our Creator, and therefore has an incontestable, irresistible dominion. 1. He stretcheth out the heavens. Not only he did so at the first, when he said, "Let there be a firmament," and he made the firmament, but he doth so still; he keeps them stretched out like a curtain; keeps them from running in, and will do so till the end comes, when the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll. No bounds can be set to his power that stretcheth out the heavens, nor can any thing be too hard for him. 2. He "layeth the foundation of the earth," and keeps it firm and fixed on its own basis, or rather on its own axis, though it is founded on the seas, Ps. xxiv. 1, 2; nay, though it is hung upon nothing, Job xxvi. 7. The founder of this earth is no doubt the ruler of it, and judgeth in it; and they deceive themselves who say, The Lord has forsaken the earth; for if he had it would have sunk, since it is he that not only did lay its foundations at first, but doth still lay them, still uphold them. 3. He "formeth the spirit of man within him," that is, "he made us these souls," Jer. xxxviii. 16. He not only breathed into the first man, but still breathes into every man the breath of life. The body is derived from the fathers of our flesh, but the soul is infused by the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9. He fashioneth men's hearts; they are in his hand, and he turns them as the rivers of water, and casts them into what mould he pleaseth, so as to serve his own purposes with them; and can therefore save his church by inspiriting his friends, and dispiriting his enemies, and will eternally save all his chosen by forming their spirits anew.

Thirdly. The promises themselves that are here made them, by which the church shall be secured, and in which all its friends may enjoy a holy security.

1. It is promised that, whatever attacks the enemies of the church may make upon her purity or peace, they will certainly issue in their own confusion. The enemies of God and of its kingdom bear a great deal of malice and ill-will to Jerusalem, and form designs for its destruction; but it will prove at last that they are but preparing ruin for themselves. Jerusalem is in safety, and they are in all the danger that fight against it. This is here illustrated by three comparisons:

1st. Jerusalem shall be a cup of trembling to all that lay siege to it, ver. 2. They promise themselves that it shall be to them a cup of wine, which they shall easily and with pleasure drink off; and they thirst for its spoils, nay, they thirst for its blood, as for such a cup; but it shall prove a cup of slumber, nay, a cup of poison to them, which when they take into their hands, and think it is all their own, they shall not be able to drink off, the fumes of it shall give them enough. When the kings were assembled against her, and saw how God was known in her palaces for a refuge, they trembled and hasted away; fear took hold upon them, as we find, Ps. xlviii. 3—6. Thus Alexander the Great was struck with amazement when he met Jaddus the high priest, and was deterred thereby from offering any violence to Jerusalem. When Sennacherib laid siege against Judah and Jerusalem he found them such a cup of stupifying wine as laid all his mighty men asleep, Ps. lxxv. 5, 6. Some read it, I will make Jerusalem a post of contrition, or breaking. They that make any attempts upon Jerusalem do but run their heads against a post, which they cannot move, but are sure to hurt themselves. The blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall, Isa. xxv. 4, broken by it, but not shaking it. God's church is a cup of consolation to all her friends, Isa. lxv. 1; but a cup of trembling to all that would either debauch her by errors and corruptions or destroy her by wars and persecutions: Isa. li. 22, 23.

2nd. Jerusalem shall be a burthensome stone to all that attempt to remove it, or carry it away, ver. 3. All the people of the earth are here supposed to be gathered together against it, some one time and some another. There has been a succession of enemies from age to age making war upon the church; nay, though they were all at once in a confederacy against it, and had formed a resolution to "cut off the name of Israel, that it should be no more in remembrance," Ps. lxxxiii. 4, they will find it a task too hard for them; they are for keeping up and advancing the kingdom of sin in the world, look upon Jerusalem, even the church of God, as the great obstacle to their designs, and they must have it out of the way; but they will find it heavier than they think it is; so that, First. They cannot remove it. God will have a church in the world in spite of them; it is built upon a rock, and is as "mount Zion that abideth for ever," Ps. cxxv. 1. This "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" will not only keep its ground, but fill the earth, Dan. ii. 35. Nay, Secondly. It will break in pieces all that burthen themselves with it, as that stone smote the image, Dan. ii. 45; all that think themselves a match for it shall be cut in pieces by it. Some think it is an allusion to a sport which Jerome, upon this place, saith was in use among the Jews, as among us. Young men tried their strength, and strove for mastery, by heaving up great stones, which, if they proved too heavy for them, fell upon them and bruised them. Those that make a jest of religion, and banter sacred things, will find them a burthensome stone,—that it is ill jesting with edge-tools; and though they make light of it, saying, "Am not I in sport?" they bring upon themselves an insupportable sinking load of guilt. Our Saviour seems to allude to these words when he speaks of himself as a burthensome stone to those that would not have him as their foundation stone, which shall "fall upon them, and grind them to powder," Mat. xxi. 44.

3rd. The governors of Judah shall be among their enemies "like a hearth of fire among the wood," and "a torch of fire in a sheaf," ver. 6. Not that their own passions shall make them incendiaries and firebrands to all about them; no, Zion's King is meek and lowly, and all subordinate governors must be like him; but God's justice will make them avengers of his cause and theirs upon their enemies. They that contend with them will find it is like an opposition given by briers and thorns to a consuming fire, Isa. xxvii. 4; it will go through them, and burn them together. It is God's wrath, and not theirs, that is the fire which devour the adversaries; God's fire is said to be in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem, Isa. xxxi. 9. The enemies thought to be as water to this fire to extinguish it, and put it quite out; but God will make them as wood, nay, as a sheaf of corn, which is more combustible to this fire, not only to be consumed by it, but to be made thereby to burn the more strongly. When God would make Abimelech and the men of Shechem one another's destroyers, fire is said to "come out from the one to devour the other," Jud. ix. 20. So here, fire shall come out from the governors of Judah to devour all the people round about, as from the mouth of God's witnesses to consume those who offer to hurt them, Rev. xi. 5. The persecutors of the primitive church found this fulfilled in it, witness Lactantius' history of God's judgments upon the primitive persecutors, and the confession of Julian the apostate at last: 'Thou hast overcome me, O thou Galilean.' The church's motto may be, Nemo me impune lacessit,—'He that assails me does it at his peril.' If you are weary of your life, persecute the Christians,' was once a proverb.

2. It is promised that God will infatuate the counsels, and enfeeble the courage, of the church's enemies; ver. 4, "In that day," when the people of the earth are gathered together against Jerusalem, "I will smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness;" and again, "I will smite every horse of the people with blindness," so that they shall be no way serviceable to them; blinding the horses will be as bad as houghing them. The horses and their horsemen shall both forget the military exercise to which they were trained; and instead of keeping ranks, and observing the rules of their discipline, they shall both go mad and ruin themselves. The church's infantry shall be quite too hard for the enemy's cavalry; and those that are upbraided with trusting in horses shall be baffled by those who were forbidden to multiply horses.

3. It is promised that Jerusalem shall be repeopled and replenished; ver. 6, "Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem." The natives of Jerusalem shall not incorporate in a colony in some other country, and build a city there, and call that Jerusalem, and see the promises fulfilled in that, as those in New England called their towns by the names of towns in Old England; no, they shall have a New Jerusalem upon the same foundation, the same spot of ground, with the old one. They had so after their return out of captivity; but this was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, which is a Jerusalem inhabited in its own place; for, the Gospel being to be preached to all the world, it may call every place its own.

4. It is promised that the inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be enabled to defend themselves, and yet shall be taken under the Divine protection, ver. 8. See here in what method God preserves his church, and those that are his, from the gates of hell to and through the gates of heaven. 1st. He doth himself secure them; "In that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem;" not only Jerusalem itself from being taken and destroyed, but every inhabitant of it from being any way damaged. God will not only be a wall of fire about the city to fortify that, but he will compass particular persons with his favour as with a shield, so that no dart of the besiegers shall touch them. 2nd. He doth it by giving them strength and courage to help themselves. What God works in his people by his grace contributes more to their preservation and defence than what he works for them by his providence. "The God of Israel gives strength and power to his people," that they may do their part, and then he will not be wanting to do his. It is the glory of God to strengthen the weak that most need his help, that see and own their need of it, and will be the most thankful for it. First. In that day the feeblest of the inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be as David, shall be men of war, as bold and brave, as skilful and strong, as David himself; shall undertake and accomplish great things, as David did, and become as serviceable to Jerusalem in guarding it as David himself was in founding it, and as formidable as he was to the enemies of it. See what Divine grace doth. It makes children not only men, but champions; makes weak saints to be not only good soldiers, but great soldiers, like David; and see how God often doth his own work as easily and effectually, and more to his own glory, by weak and obscure instruments, than by the most illustrious. Secondly. "The house of David shall be as God," that is, "as the angel of the Lord," before him. Zerubbabel was now the top branch of the house of David; he shall be endued with wisdom and grace for the service to which he is called, and shall go before the people as an angel; as that angel (so some think,) which went before the people of Israel through the wilderness, who was God himself, Ex. xxiii. 20. God will increase the gifts and abilities both of the people and princes, in proportion to the respective services for which they are designed. It was said of David that he was "as an angel of God to discern good and bad," 2 Sam. xiv. 17. Such shall now the house of David be. The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be as strong and as fit for action as nature made David, and their magistrates as wise and fit for counsel as grace made him; but this was to have its full accomplishment in Christ. Now, the house of David looked little and mean, and its glory was eclipsed; but in Christ the house of David shone more bright than ever, and its countenance was as that of an angel. In him it became more blessed, and more a blessing, than ever it had been.

5. It is promised that there shall be a very good understanding between the city and the country, and the balance shall be kept even between them. There shall be no mutual envies or jealousies between them; they shall not keep up any separate interests, but shall heartily unite in their counsels, and act in concert for the common good; and this happy agreement between the city and the country, the head and the body, is very necessary to the health, welfare, and safety of any nation.

1st. The governors of Judah, the magistrates and gentry of the country, shall think honourably of the citizens, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the merchants and tradesmen. They shall not run them down, and contrive how to keep them under; but they shall say in their hearts, not in compliment, but in sincerity, "The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be my strength," the strength of my country, of my family, "in the Lord of hosts their God," ver. 5. They will therefore upon all occasions pay respect and deference to Jerusalem as the mother city, the ruling city, and the city that is to be first served, because they look upon it to be the bulwark of the nation, and its strongest fortification in times of public danger and distress, which therefore they would all come in to the asisistance of, and come under the protection of; and this not so much because it was a rich city, and money is the sinews of war, or because it was a populous city, and could bring the greatest numbers into the field, or because its inhabitants were generally the most ingenious active men, the best soldiers, and the best commanders—"Of Zion it shall be said, that this and that" brave "man was born there"—but because it was a holy city, where God's house and household, the temple and the priests were, where his worship was kept up, and his feasts observed; and because it should now be more than ever a praying city, for "upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem" God will "pour a spirit of supplication," ver. 10. Therefore the governors of Judah shall say, "These are my strength;" they are so upon the account of their relation to, their interest in, and their communion with, "the Lord of hosts their God;" because the Lord of hosts is in a particular manner their God, for "in Salem is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion," therefore "they shall be my strength." Note, It is well with a kingdom when its great men know how to value its good men, when its governors look upon religion and religious people to be their strength, and that it is their interest to support them, and learn to call godly praying people, and skilful faithful ministers, the chariots and horsemen of Israel, as Joash called Elisha, and not the troublers of the land, as Ahab called Elijah.

2nd. The court and the city shall not despise or look with contempt upon the inhabitants of the country, no, not the meanest of them, much less upon the governors of Judah, for God will put signal honour upon Judah, and so save them from the contempt of their brethren. As Jerusalem was dignified by special ordinances, so Judah shall be dignified with special providences. God saith, ver. 3, "I will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah," upon the poor country people. Proud men scornfully overlook them, but the great God will graciously look upon them, and look after them. Nay, ver. 7, "The Lord shall save the tents of Judah first." They that dwell in tents lie most exposed; but God will remarkably protect and deliver those that dwell in Jerusalem. He will appear glorious in what he doth for the "inhabitants of his villages in Israel," Jud. v. 11. Thus, in the mystical body, God "gives more abundant honour to that part which lacked, that there may be no schism in the body: see 1 Cor. xii. 22—25; which is the reason here given why the glory of the house of David, that has great power, and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that have great wealth, and both which live in great pomp and pleasure, "may not magnify themselves against Judah," and the tents of Judah, the dwellers in which work hard and fare hard, and perhaps are not so well-bred. Note, Courtiers and citizens ought not to despise country people, or look with disdain upon those whom God opens his eyes upon, and who are first saved, while it is so hard for the rich and great to enter the kingdom of God. If God by his grace has magnified the dwellers in the tents of Judah, having chosen the weak and foolish things of the world, and chosen to employ them, we affront him if we vilify them, or magnify ourselves against them, Jas. ii. 5, 6. This promise has a farther reference to the gospel church, in which no difference shall be made between high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, circumcision and uncircumcision; but all shall be alike welcome to Christ, and partake of his benefits, Col. iii. 11. Jerusalem shall not then be thought, as it had been, more holy than other parts of the land of Israel.

9 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem.
10 And I will pour upon the house of David,
And upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem,
The spirit of grace and of supplications:
And they shall look upon me whom they have pierced,
And they shall mourn for him,
As one mourneth for his only son,
And shall be in bitterness for him,
As one that is in bitterness for his firstborn.
11 In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem,
As the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.
12 And the land shall mourn, every family apart;
The family of the house of David apart, and their wives apart;
The family of the house of Nathan apart, and their wives apart;
13 The family of the house of Levi apart, and their wives apart;
The family of Shimei apart, and their wives apart;
14 All the families that remain,
Every family apart, and their wives apart.

VALLEY OF MEGIDDO.—ver. 11.

The day here spoken of is the day of Jerusalem's defence and deliverance, that glorious day when God will appear for the salvation of his people, which if it do refer to the successes which the Jews had against their enemies in the time of the Maccabees, yet certainly it looks far to the gospel day,—to Christ's victories over the powers of darkness, and the great salvation he has wrought for his chosen. Now we have here an account of two remarkable works designed in that day.

First. A glorious work of God to be wrought for his people; "I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem," ver. 9. Nations came against Jerusalem, many and mighty nations; but they shall all be destroyed, their power shall be broken and their attempts baffled; the mischief they intend shall return upon their own head. God will seek to destroy them, not as if he were at a loss for ways and means to bring it about,—infinite wisdom was never nonplussed; but his seeking to do it intimates that he is very earnest and intent upon it,—he is jealous for Zion with great jealousy, and has the day of vengeance in his heart—and that he overrules means and instruments, and all the motions and operations of second causes, in order to it. He is framing evil against them; when he seems to be setting them up he is seeking to destroy them. In Christ's first coming, he sought to destroy him that had the power of death, and did destroy him; bruised the serpent's head, and broke all the powers of darkness that fought against God's kingdom among men, and the faithful friends and subjects of that kingdom,—spoiled them, and made a show of them openly. In his second coming he will complete their destruction, when he shall put down all opposing rule, principality, and power, and death itself shall be swallowed up in that victory,—the last enemy that shall be destroyed of all that fought against Jerusalem.

Secondly. A gracious work of God to be wrought in his people, in order to the work that is to be wrought for them. When he seeks to destroy their enemies he will "pour upon them the spirit of grace and supplication." Note, When God intends great mercy for his people, the first thing he doth is to set them a praying. Thus he seeks to destroy their enemies by stirring them up to seek to him that he would do it for them; because, though he has purposed it and promised it, and it is for his own glory to do it, yet he will "for this be inquired of by the house of Israel," Eze. xxxvi. 37. Ask, and it shall be given; this honour will he have to himself, and this honour will he put upon prayer and upon praying people. And it is a happy presage to the distressed church of deliverance approaching, and is, as it were, the dawning of its day when his people are stirred up to cry mightily to him for it. But this promise has reference to, and is performed in, the graces of the Spirit given to all believers, as that Isa. xliv. 3, "I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed," which was fulfilled when Jesus was glorified, Jno. vii. 39. It is a promise of the Spirit, and with him of all spiritual blessings in heavenly things by Christ. Now observe here,

1. On whom these blessings are poured out. 1st. On the house of David, on the great men, for they are no more and no better than the grace of God makes them. It was promised, ver. 8, that "the house of David" shall be "as the angel of the Lord." Now in order to that the Spirit of grace is poured upon them; for the more the saints have of the Spirit of grace, the more like they are to the holy angels. When God was about to appear for the land, he poured his Spirit of grace upon the house of David, the leading men of the land. It bodes well to a people when they go before the rest in that which is good, as 2 Chr. xx. 5. The house of David is all summed up in Jesus Christ, the son of David, and upon him, as the head, the Spirit of grace is poured out, from him to be diffused to all his members; "from his fulness we receive, and grace for grace." 2nd. On the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the common people; for the operations of the Spirit are the same upon the mean and weak Christians that they are upon the strong and more grown. The inhabitants of Jerusalem cannot influence public affairs by their powers and policies so as the great men of the house of David may, yet they may do good service by their prayers, and therefore upon them the Spirit shall be poured out. The church is Jerusalem, the heavenly Jerusalem; all true believers that have their conversation in heaven are inhabitants of this Jerusalem, and to them this promise belongs,—God will pour out his Spirit upon them. This is that earnest which all that believe in Christ shall receive; thus are they sanctified, thus are they sealed.

2. What these blessings are. "I will pour upon them the Spirit." That includes all good things, as it qualifies us for the favour of God and all his other gifts. He will pour out the Spirit, 1st. As a Spirit of grace, to sanctify us, and to make us gracious. 2nd. As a Spirit of supplication, inclining us to, instructing and assisting us in, the duty of prayer. Note, Wherever the Spirit is given as a Spirit of grace, he is given as a Spirit of sanctification. Wherever he is a Spirit of adoption, he "teacheth to cry, Abba, Father." As soon as ever Paul was converted, "Behold, he prays," Acts ix. 11. You may as soon find a living man without breath as a living saint without prayer. There is a more plentiful effusion of the spirit of prayer now under the Gospel than was under the law; and the farther the work of sanctification is carried in us, the better is the work of supplication carried on by us.

3. What the effect of them will be. "I will pour upon them the Spirit of grace." One would think it should follow, And they shall look on him whom they believed and shall rejoice; and it is true that that is one of the fruits of the pouring out of the Spirit, whence we read of the joy of the Holy Ghost. But it follows, They shall mourn, for there is a holy mourning that is the effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, a mourning for sin, which is of use to quicken faith in Christ, and qualify for joy in God. It is here made the matter of a promise that they shall mourn, for there is a mourning that will end in rejoicing, and hath a blessing entailed upon it. This mourning is a fruit of the Spirit of grace, an evidence of a work of grace in the soul, and a companion of the Spirit of supplication, as it expresseth lively affections working in prayer; hence prayers and tears are often put together, 2 Kin. xx. 5. Jacob, that wrestler with God, wept and made supplication. But here it is a mourning for sin that is the effect of the pouring out of the Spirit.

1st. It is a mourning grounded upon a sight of Christ; "They shall look on him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for him." Here, First. It is foretold that Christ should be pierced, and this Scripture is quoted as that which was fulfilled when Christ's side was pierced upon the cross: see Jno. xix. 37. Secondly. He is spoken of as one whom we have pierced. It is spoken primarily of the Jews, who persecuted him to the death, (and we find that they who pierced him are distinguished from the other kindreds of the earth that shall wail because of him, Rev. i. 7,) yet it is true of us all as sinners; we have pierced Christ, inasmuch as our sins were the cause of his death, for he was wounded for our transgressions, and they are the grief of his soul. He is broken with the whorish heart of sinners, who therefore are said to crucify him afresh, and put him to open shame. Thirdly. Those that truly repent of sin look upon Christ as one whom they have pierced, who was pierced for their sins, and is pierced by them; and this engageth them to look unto him as those that are deeply concerned for him. Fourthly. This is the effect of their looking to Christ, it makes them mourn. This was particularly fulfilled in those to whom Peter preached Christ crucified; when they heard it they who had had a hand in piercing him were pricked to the heart, and cried out, "What shall we do?" It is fulfilled in all those who sorrow for sin after a godly sort; they look to Christ and mourn for him, not so much for his sufferings as for their own sins that procured them. Note, The genuine sorrows of a penitent soul flow from the believing sight of a pierced Saviour. Looking by faith upon the cross of Christ will set us a mourning for sin after a godly sort.

2nd. It is a great mourning. First. It is like the mourning of a parent for the death of a beloved child. They shall mourn for sin as one mourneth for an only son, in whose grave the hopes of his family are buried, and shall be inwardly "in bitterness as one that is in bitterness for his firstborn;" as the Egyptians were when there was a cry throughout the land for the death of their firstborn. The sorrow of children for the death of their parents is sometimes counterfeited, is often small, and soon wears off and is forgotten; but the sorrow of parents for a child, for a son, for an only son, for a firstborn, is natural, sincere, unforced, and unaffected; it is secret and lasting. Such are the sorrows of a true penitent, flowing purely from love to Christ above any other. Secondly. It is like the mourning of the people for the death of a wise and good prince. It shall be like "the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon," where good king Josiah was slain, for whom there was a general lamentation, ver. 11; and perhaps the greater because they were told it was their sin that provoked God to deprive them of so great a blessing; therefore they cried out, "The crown is fallen from our head; woe unto us, for we have sinned," Lam. v. 16. Christ is our king; our sins were his death, and for that reason ought to be our grief.

3rd. It is a general, universal mourning; ver. 12, "The land shall mourn." The land itself put on mourning at the death of Christ, for there was then "darkness over all the land," and the earth trembled. But this is a promise that, in consideration of the death of Christ, multitudes shall be effectually brought to sorrow for sin, and turn to God; it shall be such a universal, gracious mourning as was when "all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord," 1 Sam. vii. 2. Some think this is yet to have its complete accomplishment in the general conversion of the Jewish nation.

4th. It is also a private, particular mourning. There shall be not only a mourning of the land by its representatives in a general assembly, as Jud. ii. 5, when the place was called Bochim, 'a place of weepers,' but it shall spread itself into all corners of the land. "Every family apart" shall mourn," ver. 12; "all the families that remain," ver. 14. All have contributed to the guilt, and therefore all shall share in the grief. Note, The exercises of devotion should be performed by private families among themselves, besides their joining in public assemblies for religious worship. National fasts must be observed not only in our synagogues but in our houses. In the mourning here foretold the wives mourn apart by themselves, in their own apartment, as "Esther and her maids." And some think it intimates their denying themselves the use even of lawful delights in a time of general humiliation, 1 Cor. vii. 5.

Four several families are here instanced as examples to others in this mourning. First. Two of them are royal families; the house of David, in Solomon, and the house of Nathan, another son of David, brother to Solomon, from whom Zerubbabel descended, as appears by Christ's genealogy, Lu. iii. 27—31. The house of David, particularly that of Nathan, which is now the chief branch of that house, shall go before in this good work; the greatest princes must not think themselves exempted from the law of repentance, but rather obliged most solemnly to express it, for the exciting of others, as Hezekiah humbled himself, 2 Chr. xxxii. 26; the princes and the king, 2 Chr. xii. 6; and the king of Nineveh, Jon. iii. 6. Secondly. Two of them are sacred families; ver. 13, "The family of the house of Levi," which was God's tribe, and in it particularly the family of Shimei, which was a branch of the tribe of Levi, 1 Chr. vi. 17; and probably some of the descendants of that family were now of note for preachers to the people, or ministers to the altar. As the princes must mourn for the sins of the magistracy, so must the priests for the iniquity of the holy things. In times of general tribulation and humiliation the Lord's ministers are concerned to "weep between the porch and the altar," Joel ii. 17, and not only there, but in their houses apart; for in what families should godliness, both in the form and in the power of it, be found, if not in ministers' families?

CHAPTER XIII.

In this chapter we have, I. Some farther promises relating to gospel times; here is a promise of the remission of sins, ver. 1; and of the reformation of manners, ver. 2; and particularly of the convicting and silencing of false prophets, ver. 2—6. II. A clear prediction of the sufferings of Christ, and the dispersion of his disciples thereupon, ver. 7; and of the destruction of the greater part of the Jewish nation not long after, ver. 8; and of the purifying of a remnant of them, a peculiar people to God, ver. 9.

Behold here the Lamb of God taking away the sin of the world, the sin of the church; for therefore was the Son of God manifested, to take away our sin, 1 Jno. iii. 5.

First. He takes away the guilt of sin by the blood of his cross; ver. 1, "In that day," in the gospel day, "there shall be a fountain opened," that is, provision made, for the cleansing of all those from the pollutions of sin that truly repent and are sorry for them. In that day, when the Spirit of grace is poured out to set them a mourning for their sins, they shall not mourn as those that have no hope, but they shall have their sins pardoned, and the comfort of it in their bosoms. Their consciences shall be purified and pacified by the "blood of Christ, which cleanseth from all sin," 1 Jno. i. 7; for Christ is exalted to give both repentance and remission of sins, and where he gives the one no doubt he gives the other. This fountain opened is the pierced side of Jesus Christ, spoken of just before, ch. xii. 10, for thence came thereout blood and water, and both for cleansing. And those who look upon Christ pierced, and mourn for their sins that pierced him, and are therefore in bitterness for him, may look again upon Christ pierced, and rejoice in him, because it pleased the Lord thus to smite this rock that it might be to us "a fountain of living waters." See here,

1. How we are polluted. We are all so; we have sinned, and sin is uncleanness; it defiles the mind and conscience, renders us odious to God, and uneasy in ourselves; unfit to be employed in the service of God and admitted into communion with him, as those that were ceremonially unclean were shut out of the sanctuary. The house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem are under sin, which is uncleanness. The truth is, we are all as an unclean thing, and deserve to have our portion with the unclean.

2. How we may be purged. Behold there is a fountain opened for us to wash in, and streams flowing to us from that fountain, so that if we be not made clean it is our own fault. The blood of Christ, and God's pardoning mercy in that blood, revealed in the new covenant, is, 1st. A fountain; for there is in them an inexhaustible fulness. There is mercy enough in God, and merit enough in Christ, for the forgiving of the greatest sins and sinners, upon gospel terms. "Such were some of you, but you are washed," 1 Cor. vi. 11. Under the law there was a brazen laver and a brazen sea to wash in; those were but vessels, but we have a fountain to apply ourselves to, overflowing, ever-flowing. 2nd. It is a fountain opened; for whoever will may come and take the benefit of it. It is opened not only to the house of David, but to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; to the poor and mean as well as to the rich and great; or it is opened to all believers, who, as the spiritual seed of Christ, are of the house of David, and, as living members of the church, are inhabitants of Jerusalem. Through Christ all that believe are justified; are "washed from their sins in his blood," that they may be "made to our God kings and priests," Rev. i. 5, 6.

Secondly. He takes away the dominion of sin by the power of his grace, even of beloved sins. This evermore accompanies the former; those that are washed in the fountain opened, as they are justified, so they are sanctified; the water came with the blood out of the pierced side of Christ. It is here promised that in that day,

1. Idolatry shall be quite abolished, and the people of the Jews shall be effectually cured of their inclination to it; ver. 2, "I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land." The worship of the idols of their fathers shall be so perfectly rooted out, that in one generation or two it shall be forgotten that ever there were such idols among them; they shall either not be named at all or not with any respect; "they shall be no more remembered," as was promised,

Hos. ii. 17. This was fulfilled in the rooted aversion which the Jews had after the captivity to idols and idolatry, and still retain to this day, and in the ready conversion of many to the faith of Christ, by which they were taken off from making an idol of the ceremonial law, as the unbelieving Jews did; and is still in the fulfilling when souls are brought off from the world and the flesh, those two great idols, that they may cleave to God only.

2. False prophecy shall also be brought to an end. "I will cause the prophets and the unclean spirit," that is, the prophets that are under the influence of the unclean spirit, to "pass out of the land." The devil is an unclean spirit; sin and uncleanness are from him; he hath his prophets, that serve his interests and receive their instructions from him. Take away the unclean spirit, and the prophets would not deceive as they do; take away the false prophets, that produce sham commissions, and the unclean spirit could not do the mischief he doth. When God designs the silencing of the false prophets he banisheth the unclean spirit out of the land, that wrought in them, and was a rival with him for the throne in the heart. The church of the Jews, when they were addicted to idols, did also doat much upon false prophets that flattered them in their sins with promises of impunity and peace; but here it is promised, as a blessed effect of the promised reformation, that they should be very much set against false prophets, and zealous to clear the land of them. They were so after the captivity, till, through the blindness of their zeal against false prophets, they had put Christ to death under that character, and after that there arose many false Christs and false prophets, and deceived many, Mat. xxiv. 11. It is here foretold,

1st. That false prophets, instead of being indulged and favoured, should be brought to condign punishment even by their nearest relations, which would be as great an instance as any other of flagrant zeal against those deceivers, ver. 3. When any shall set up for a prophet, and shall speak lies in the name of the Lord, shall preach that which tends to draw people from God, and to confirm them in sin, his own parents shall be the first and most forward to prosecute him for it, according to the law, Deu. xiii. 6—11, "If thy son entice thee secretly" from God, "thou shalt surely kill him." Shew thy indignation against him, and prevent any farther temptation from him. His "father and mother shall thrust him through when he prophesieth." Note, We ought to conceive, and always to retain, a very great detestation and dread of every thing that would draw us out of the way of our duty into by paths, as those who cannot bear that which is evil, Rev. ii. 2. A holy zeal for God and godliness will make us hate sin and dread temptation most in those whom naturally we love best, and who are nearest to us; there our danger is greatest, as Adam's from Eve, Job's from his wife; and there it will be most praiseworthy to shew our zeal, as Levi, who in the cause of God did not acknowledge his brethren, or know his own children, Deu. xxxiii. 9. Thus we must hate and forsake our nearest relations, when they come in competition with our duty to God, Lu. xiv. 26. Natural affections, even the strongest, must be overruled by gracious affections.

2nd. That false prophets should be themselves convinced of their sin and folly, and let fall their pretensions; ver. 4. "The prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision." They shall not repeat it or insist upon it, but desire that it may be forgotten, and no more said of it, being ready themselves to own it was a sham; either because God has, by his grace, awakened their consciences and shewed them their error, or because the event disproves their predictions and gives them the lie, or because their prophecies do not meet with such a favourable reception as they used to meet with, but are generally despised and distasted. They perceive the people ashamed of them, which makes them begin to be ashamed of themselves; and therefore they shall no longer wear a rough garment, or garment of hair, as the true prophets used to do, in imitation of Elijah, and in token of their being mortified to the pleasures and delights of sense. The pretenders had appeared in the habit of true prophets; but, their folly being now made manifest, they shall lay it aside, no more to deceive and impose upon unthinking, unwary people by it. A modest dress is a very good thing, if it be the genuine indication of a humble heart, and is to instruct; but an ill thing if it be the hypocritical disguise of a proud, ambitious heart, and is to deceive. Let men be really as good as they seem to be, but not seem to be better than really they are. This pretender, as a true penitent, First. Shall undeceive those whom he had imposed upon. "He shall say, I am no prophet," as I have pretended to be, was never designed or set apart to the office, never educated or brought up for it, never conversant among the sons of the prophets; "I am an husbandman," and was bred to that business; I was never taught of God to prophesy, but taught of man to keep cattle. Amos was originally such a one too, and yet was afterwards called to be a prophet, Am. vii. 14, 15; but this deceiver never had any such call. Note, Those who sorrow after a godly sort for their having deceived others will be forward to confess their sin, and will be so just as to rectify the mistakes which they have been the cause of. Thus they who had used curious arts, when they were converted shewed their deeds, and by what fallacies they had cheated the people, Acts xix. 18. Secondly. He shall return to his own proper employment, which is the fittest for him. I will be a husbandman, so it may be read; I will apply myself to my calling again, and meddle no more with things that belong not to me; for man taught me to keep cattle from my youth, and cattle I will go keep, and never set up for a preacher any more. Note, When we are convinced that we are gone out of the way of our duty, we must evidence the truth of our repentance by returning to it again, though it be never so much a mortification to us. Thirdly. He shall acknowledge those to be his friends that by a severe discipline were instrumental to bring him to a sight of his error, ver. 6. When he who, with the greatest assurance, had asserted himself so lately to be a prophet suddenly drops his claim, and saith, I am no prophet, every body will be surprised at it, and some will ask, "What are these wounds" or marks of stripes "in thine hands?" How camest thou by them? Hast thou not been examined by scourging? and is not that it that has brought thee to thyself? (Vexatio dat intellectum,—'Vexation sharpens the intellect.) Hast thou not been beaten into this acknowledgment? Was it not the rod and reproof that gave thee this wisdom? And he shall own, Yes, it was; these are the wounds "with which I was wounded in the house of my friends," that bound me and used me hardly and severely as a distracted man, and so brought me to my senses. By this it appears that those parents of the false prophet that "thrust him through," ver. 3, did not do it till they had first tried to reclaim him by correction, and he would not be reclaimed; for so was the law concerning a disobedient son,—his parents must first have chastened him in vain, before they bring him forth to be stoned, Deu. xxi. 18, 19. But here is another that was reduced by stripes, and so prevented the capital punishment; and he had that sense and honesty to own that they were his friends, his real friends, who thus wounded him that they might reclaim him; for "faithful are the wounds of a friend," Pr. xxvii. 6. Some good interpreters, observing how soon this comes after the mention of Christ being pierced, think that these are the words of that great Prophet, not of the false prophet spoken of before. Christ was wounded in his hands when they were nailed to the cross, and after his resurrection he had the marks of these wounds; and here he tells how he came by them; he received them as a false prophet, for the chief priests called him a deceiver, and upon that account would have him crucified. But he received them "in the house of his friends," the Jews, that should have been his friends, for he came to his own; and though they were his bitter enemies, yet he was pleased to call them his friends, as he did Judas, "Friend, wherefore art thou come?" because they forwarded his sufferings for him, as he called Peter, Satan,—'an adversary,' because he dissuaded him from them.

7 Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, [of hosts:
And against the man that is my fellow, saith the LORD
Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered:
And I will turn mine hand upon the little ones.
8 And it shall come to pass,
That in all the land, saith the LORD,
Two parts therein shall be cut off and die;
But the third shall be left therein.
9 And I will bring the third part through the fire,
And will refine them as silver is refined,
And will try them as gold is tried:
They shall call on my name, and I will hear them:
I will say, It is my people:
And they shall say, The LORD is my God.

Here is a prophecy,

First. Of the sufferings of Christ, of him who was to be pierced, and was to be the fountain opened. "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd," ver. 7. These are the words of God the Father, giving order and commission to the sword of his justice to awake against the Son, when he had voluntarily made his soul an offering for sin; for it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief; and he was stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted, Isa. liii. 4, 10. Observe, 1. How he calls him. As God he is my fellow, for he thought it no robbery to be equal with God; he and the Father are one. He was from eternity by him, as one brought up with him, and in the work of man's redemption he was his elect, in whom his soul delighted; and the counsel of peace was between them both. As Mediator he is my Shepherd, that great and good Shepherd that undertook to feed the flock, ch. xi. 7. He is the Shepherd that was to lay down his life for the sheep. 2. How he useth him. "Awake, O sword, against him." If he will be a sacrifice, he must be slain, for without the shedding of blood, the life blood, there was no remission. Men thrust him through as a foolish shepherd; God thrust him through as the good Shepherd, (compare ver. 3,) that he might purchase the flock of God with his own blood, Acts xx. 28. It is not a charge given to a rod to correct him, but to a sword to slay him; for Messiah the Prince must be cut off, but not for himself, Dan. ix. 26. It is not the sword of war to whom he has given this charge, that he may die in the bed of honour, but the sword of justice, that he may die as a criminal, upon an ignominious tree. This sword must awake against him; he having no sin of his own to answer for, the sword of justice had nothing to say to him of itself, till, by particular order from the Judge of all, it was warranted to brandish itself against him. He was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, in the decree and counsel of God; but the sword designed against him had long slumbered, till now at length it is called upon to awake, not awake and frighten him, but awake and smite him; strike home, not with a drowsy blow, but an awakened one. God spared not his own Son.

Secondly. Of the dispersion of the disciples thereupon. "Smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered." This our Lord Jesus himself saith was fulfilled, when "all his disciples were offended because of him," in the night wherein he was betrayed, Mat. xxvi. 31; Mar. xiv. 27. They all forsook him and fled. The smiting of the Shepherd is the scattering of the sheep. They were "scattered every one to his own, and left him alone," Jno. xvi. 32. Herein they were like timorous sheep, yet the Shepherd thus provided for their safety, for he said, "If ye seek me, let these go their way." Some make another application of this: Christ was the shepherd of the Jewish nation; he was smitten, they themselves smote him, and therefore they were justly scattered abroad, and dispersed among the nations, and remain so at this day. These words, "I will turn my hand upon the little ones," may be understood either as a threatening,—as Christ suffered, so shall his disciples, they shall drink of the cup that he drank of, and be baptized with the baptism that he is baptized with,—or as a promise that God will gather Christ's scattered disciples together again, and he should give them the meeting in Galilee. Though the little ones among Christ's soldiers may be dispersed, they shall rally again; the lambs of his flock, though frightened by the beasts of prey, shall recover themselves, shall be gathered in his arms, and laid in his bosom. Sometimes when the sheep are scattered and lost in the wilderness, yet the little ones, which it was feared would be a prey, Num. xiv. 31, are brought in, are brought home, and God turns his hand upon them.

Thirdly. Of the rejection and ruin of the unbelieving Jews, ver. 8; and this word has, and shall have, its accomplishment in the destruction of the corrupt and hypocritical part of the church. It shall come to pass that in all the land of Israel two parts shall be cut off and die; the Roman army laid the country waste, and slew at least two-thirds of the Jews. Some understand by the cutting off and dying of two parts in all the earth, the abolishing of heathenism and Judaism, that Christianity, the third part, might be left to reign alone. The Jewish worship was quite taken away by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. And some time after pagan idolatry was in a manner extirpated when the empire became Christian.

Fourthly. Of the reformation and the preservation of the chosen remnant, those of them that believed, and the Christian church in general, ver. 9; the third part shall be left. When Jerusalem and Judæa were destroyed, all the Christians in that country, having among them the warning Christ gave them to flee to the mountains, shifted for their own safety, and were sheltered in a city called Pella, on the other side Jordan. We have here, first the trials, and then the triumphs, of the Christian church, and of all the faithful members of it. 1. Their trials. I will bring that third part through the fire of affliction, and will refine and try them as silver and gold are refined and tried. This was fulfilled in the persecutions of the primitive church, the fiery trial which tried the people of God then, 1 Pet. iv. 12. Those that God sets apart for himself must pass through a probation and purification in this world; they must be tried that their faith may be found to praise and honour, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7, as Abraham's faith was when it was tried by the command given him to offer up Isaac; "Now know I that thou fearest me." They must be tried, that both they that are perfect and they that are not may be made manifest. They must be refined from their dross, their corruption must be purged out, they must be brightened and bettered. 2. Their triumphs. 1st. Their communion with God is their triumph. "They shall call on my name and I will hear them." They write to God by prayer, and receive from him answers of peace, and thus keep up a comfortable communion with him; this honour have all his saints. 2nd. Their covenant with God is their triumph. I will say, It is my people, whom I have chosen and loved, and will own; and they shall say, The Lord is my God, and a God all-sufficient to me; and in him they shall boast every day, and all the day long. "This God is our God for ever and ever."

CHAPTER XIV.

Divers things were foretold in the two foregoing chapters which should come to pass in that day, and this chapter speaks of a day of the Lord that cometh, a day of his judgment; and ten times in the foregoing chapters, and seven times in this, it is repeated, in that day; but what that day is that is here meant is uncertain, and perhaps will be so (as the Jews speak) till Elias comes. Whether it refer to the whole period of time, from the prophet's days to the days of the Messiah, or to some particular events in that time, or to Christ's coming, and the setting up of his kingdom upon the ruins of the Jewish polity, we cannot determine; but divers passages here seem to look as far as gospel times. Now the day of the Lord brings with it both judgment and mercy; mercy to his church, judgment to her enemies and persecutors. I. The gates of hell are here threatening the church, ver. 1, 2, and yet not prevailing. II. The power of heaven appears here for the church, and against the enemies of it, ver. 3—5. III. The events concerning the church are here represented as mixed, ver. 6, 7, but issuing well at last. IV. The spreading of the means of knowledge is here foretold, and the setting up of the gospel kingdom in the world, ver. 8, 9; which shall be the enlargement and establishment of another Jerusalem, ver. 10, 11. V. Those shall be reckoned with that fought against Jerusalem, ver. 12—15; and those that neglect his worship there, ver. 17—19. VI. It is promised that there shall be great resort to the church, and great purity and piety in it, ver. 16, 20, 21.

BEHOLD, the day of the LORD cometh,
And thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee.
2 For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle;
And the city shall be taken,
And the houses rifled, and the women ravished;
And half of the city shall go forth into captivity,
And the residue of the people shall not be cut off from [the city.
3 Then shall the LORD go forth,
And fight against those nations,
As when he fought in the day of battle.
4 And his feet shall stand in that day
Upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east,
And the mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof
Toward the east and toward the west,
And there shall be a very great valley;
And half of the mountain shall remove toward the north,
And half of it toward the south.
5 And ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains;
For the valley of the mountains shall reach unto Azal:
Yea, ye shall flee, like as ye fled from before the earth-[quake
In the days of Uzziah king of Judah:
And the LORD my God shall come,
And all the saints with thee.
6 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That the light shall not be clear, nor dark:
7 But it shall be one day
Which shall be known to the LORD,
Not day, nor night: [light.
But it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be

God's providences concerning his church are here represented as strangely changing, and strangely mixed.

First. As strangely changing. Sometimes the tide runs high and strong against them, but presently turns and comes to be in favour of them; and God has for wise and holy ends set the one over against the other.

1. God here appears against Jerusalem. Judgment begins at the house of God; when "the day of the Lord cometh," ver. 1, Jerusalem must pass through the fire to be refined. God himself "gathers all nations against Jerusalem to battle," ver. 2; he gives them a charge as he did Sennacherib to take the spoil, and to take the prey, Isa. x. 6. For the people of Jerusalem are now become the people of his wrath; and who can stand before him, or before nations gathered by him? Where he gives commission he will give success; the city shall be taken by the Romans, that have nations at command; the houses shall be rifled, and all the riches of them taken away by the enemy; and to gratify an insatiable lust of uncleanness, as well as avarice, the women shall be ravished, as if victory were a licence to the worst of villanies, jusque datum scelerі,—'and crimes were sanctioned by law.' One half of the city shall then be carried into captivity to be sold or enslaved, and shall not be able to help themselves, such is the destruction that shall be made in the great and terrible day of the Lord.

2. He presently changeth his way, and appears for Jerusalem; for though judgment begin at the house of God, yet as it shall not end there, so it shall not make a full end there, Jer. iv. 27; xxx. 11.

1st. A remnant shall be spared, the same with that third part spoken of ch. xiii. 8. One half "shall go into captivity," whence they may hereafter be fetched back, "and the residue of the people shall not be cut off," as one would have feared, from the city. Many of the Jews shall receive the Gospel, and so shall prevent their being cut off from the city of God, his church upon earth. "In it shall be a tenth," Isa. vi. 13: see Eze. vi. 3.

2nd. Their cause shall be pleaded against their enemies, ver. 3. Then when God has made use of these nations as a scourge to his people, he shall go forth and fight against them by his judgments, as when he fought against the enemies of his church formerly, in the day of battle, with the Egyptians, Canaanites, and others. Note, The instruments of God's wrath will themselves be made the objects of it, for it will come to their turn to drink of the cup of trembling; and whom God fights against he will be sure to overcome, and be too hard for. And every former day of battle which God has made to his people a day of triumph, as it is an engagement to God to appear for his people, because he is the same, so it is an encouragement to them to trust in him. It is observable that the Roman empire never flourished after the destruction of Jerusalem as it had done before, but in many instances God fought against it.

3rd. Though Jerusalem and the temple be destroyed, yet God will have a church in the world, into which Gentiles shall be admitted, and with whom the believing Jews shall be incorporated, ver. 4, 5. These verses are dark and hard to be understood, but divers good expositors take this to be the meaning of them: First. God will carefully inspect Jerusalem, even then when the enemies of it are laying it waste; "His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives," whence he may take a full view of the city and temple, Mar. xiii. 3. When the refiner puts his gold into the furnace, he stands by it, and has his eye upon it, to see that it receive no damage; so when Jerusalem, God's gold, is to be refined, he will have the oversight of it; he will stand by upon the mount of Olives. This was literally fulfilled when our Lord Jesus was often upon this mountain, especially when from thence "he ascended up into heaven," Acts i. 12. It was the last place on which his feet stood on this earth, the place from which he took rise. Secondly. The partition wall between Jews and Gentiles shall be taken away. The mountains about Jerusalem, and particularly this, signified it to be an inclosure, and stood in the way of those that would approach to it. Between the Gentiles and Jerusalem this mountain of Bether, of division, stood, Cant. ii. 17. But by the destruction of Jerusalem this mountain shall be made to cleave in the midst, and so the Jewish pale shall be taken down, and the church laid in common with the Gentiles, who were made one with the Jews, by the "breaking down of this middle wall of partition," Eph. ii. 14. "Who art thou, O great mountain?" And a great mountain the ceremonial law was in the way of the Jews' conversion, which one would think could never have been got over, yet before Christ and his Gospel it was made plain. This mountain departs, this hill removes, but the covenant of peace cannot be broken; for peace is still preached to him that is afar off and to them that are nigh. Thirdly. A new and living way shall be opened to the new Jerusalem, both to see it and to come into it. The mountain being divided, one half towards the north, and the other half towards the south, "there shall be a very great valley;" that is, a broad way of communication opened between Jerusalem and the Gentile world, by which the Gentiles shall have free admission into the gospel Jerusalem, and the word of the Lord that goes forth from Jerusalem shall have a free course into the Gentile world. Thus the way of the Lord is prepared, for "every mountain and hill shall be brought low," and plain and pleasant valleys shall come in the room of them, Isa. xl. 4. Fourthly. Those of the Jews that believe shall come in and join themselves to the Gentiles, and incorporate with them in the gospel church; "Ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains," that valley that is opened between the divided halves of the mount of Olives; they shall hasten into the church with the Gentiles, as formerly the Gentiles with them, ch. viii. 23. The "valley of the mountains" is the gospel church, to which there were added of the Jews daily such as should be saved, who fled to that valley as to their refuge. This valley of the mountains is said to reach unto Azal, or to the separate place; that is, to all those whom God hath set apart for himself. When God "makes his mountains a way," Isa. xlix. 11, by making them a valley, the way shall be opened to all the wayfaring men, Isa. xxxv. 8, and though fools they shall not err therein. Or, to those that are now separated from God this valley shall reach; for the Gentiles that are afar off shall be nigh with the Jews, that are a people near unto him, and both have an access, a mutual access, to each other, and a joint access to God as a Father by one Spirit, Eph. ii. 18. Fifthly. They shall flee to the valley of the mountains, to the gospel church, under dreadful apprehensions of their danger from the curse of the law. They shall "flee from the wrath to come," from the avenger of blood that is in pursuit of them, to the church as to a city of refuge, or as doves to their windows, as they "fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah," Am. i. 1. Therefore the Gospel reveals the wrath of God from heaven, Rom. i. 18, that we might be awakened to escape for our lives. Flee as from an earthquake; for we feel the earth ready to sink under us, and we can find no firm footing in it, and therefore must flee to Christ, in whom alone we can stand fast and be easy.

4th. God shall appear in his glory for the accomplishing of all this. "The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee," which may refer to his coming to destroy Jerusalem, or to destroy the enemies of Jerusalem, or his coming to set up his kingdom in the world, which is called "the coming of the Son of man," Mat. xxiv. 37; or to his last coming at the end of time. However, it teaches us, First. That the Lord will come. It has been the faith of all the saints. "Behold, the Lord comes" to fulfil every word that he hath spoken in its season. Secondly. When he comes all his saints come with him; they attend his motions, and are ready to serve his interests. Christ will come at the end of time with ten thousand of his saints, as when he came to give the law upon mount Sinai. Thirdly. Every particular believer being related to God, as his God, may triumph in the expectation of his coming, and speak of it with pleasure: "The Lord my God shall come," shall come to the comfort of all that are his; for, blessed Lord, "all the saints shall be with thee," and it shall be their everlasting happiness to dwell in thy presence; and therefore come, Lord Jesus. And some think this may be read as a prayer, 'Yet, O Lord my God, come, and bring all the saints with thee.'

Secondly. God's providences appear here strangely mixed; ver. 6, 7, In that day of the Lord, "the light shall not be clear, nor dark, not day nor night;" but "at evening time it shall be light." Some refer this to all the time from hence to the coming of the Messiah. The Jewish church had neither perfect peace nor constant trouble, but a cloudy day, neither rain nor sunshine. But it may be taken more generally as designed to represent the method God usually takes in the administration of the kingdom, both of providence and grace. Here is,

1. An idea of the usual course and tenor of God's dispensations. The day of his grace and the day of his providence are neither clear, nor dark, not day nor night. It is so with the church of God in this world; where the Sun of righteousness is risen it cannot be dark night, and yet, short of heaven, it will not be clear day. It is so with particular saints; they are not darkness, but light in the Lord; and yet while there is so much error and corruption remaining in them, it is not perfect day. So it is as to the providences of God that are concerning his church; in general the affairs of the church are neither good nor bad in any extremity, but there is a mixture of both; we are singing both of mercy and judgment, and are uncertain which will prevail, whether it be an evening or a morning twilight. We are between hope and fear, not knowing what to make of things.

2. An intimation of comfort, with reference hereunto. "It shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord." This intimates, 1st. The beauty and harmony of such mixed events. There is one and the same tendency in all; all the wheels make but one wheel, all the revolutions but one day. 2nd. The brevity of them. It is as it were but for one day, for a little moment; the cloud that darkens the light will soon blow over. 3rd. The eye God has upon all these events, and the hand he has in them all; they are known to the Lord. He takes notice of them, and orders and disposeth of all for the best, according to the council of his will.

3. An issue very joyful secured at last. "At evening time it shall be light;" it shall be clear light, and no longer dark. We are sure of it in the other world, and we hope for it in this world. At evening time, when our hopes are quite spent with waiting all day to no purpose, nay, when we fear it will go to be quite dark, when things are at the worst, and the case of the church is most deplorable. As to the church's enemies the sun goes down at noon, so to the church it rises at night; unto the upright springs light out of darkness, Ps. cxii. 4. Deliverance comes when the tale of bricks is doubled, and when God's people had done looking for it, and so it comes with a pleasing surprise.

8 And it shall be in that day,
That living waters shall go out from Jerusalem;
Half of them toward the former sea,
And half of them toward the hinder sea:
In summer and in winter shall it be.
9 And the LORD shall be king over all the earth:
In that day shall there be one LORD, and his name one.
10 All the land shall be turned as a plain
From Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem:
And it shall be lifted up, and inhabited in her place,
From Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, [presses.
And from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine-
11 And men shall dwell in it,
And there shall be no more utter destruction;
But Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited.
12 And this shall be the plague wherewith the LORD will smite all the people
That have fought against Jerusalem; [their feet,
Their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon
And their eyes shall consume away in their holes,
And their tongue shall consume away in their mouth.
13 And it shall come to pass in that day,
That a great tumult from the LORD shall be among them;
And they shall lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbour, [bour.
And his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neigh-
14 And Judah also shall fight at Jerusalem;
And the wealth of all the heathen round about shall be gathered together,
Gold, and silver, and apparel, in great abundance.
15 And so shall be the plague of the horse,
Of the mule, of the camel, and of the ass,
And of all the beasts that shall be in these tents,
As this plague.

Here is, First. Blessings promised to Jerusalem, the gospel Jerusalem, in the day of the Messiah, and to all the earth, by virtue of the blessings poured out on Jerusalem, especially to the land of Israel.

1. Jerusalem shall be a spring of living waters to the world. It was made so when there the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, and thence the word of the Lord diffused itself to the nations about; ver. 8, "Living waters shall go out from Jerusalem," for there they began, and thence they set out that were to preach repentance and remission of sins unto all nations, Lu. xxiv. 47. Note, Where the Gospel goes, and the graces of God's Spirit go along with it, there living waters go. Those streams that "make glad the city of our God" make glad the country also, and make it like paradise, like the garden of the Lord, which was well watered. It was the honour of Jerusalem that "from thence the word of the Lord went forth," Isa. ii. 3. And thus far, even in its worst and most degenerate age, for old acquaintance sake, it was made a blessing, and to be so is to be blessed. Half of these waters shall go towards the former sea, and half towards the hinder sea, as all rivers bend their course towards some sea or other, some eastward, others westward. The Gospel shall spread into all parts of the world, some that lie remote from Jerusalem one way, and others that lie as far off another way; for the dominion of the Redeemer which was thereby to be set up must be from sea to sea, Ps. lxxii. 8, and the earth must be full of the knowledge of the Lord "as the waters cover the sea," and as the waters that in various channels run to the sea. The knowledge of God shall diffuse itself, 1st. Every way. These living waters shall produce both eastern churches and western churches, that shall each of them in their turn be illustrious. 2nd. Every day. In summer and in winter it shall be. Note, Those that are employed in spreading the Gospel may find themselves work both winter and summer, and are to serve the Lord therein at all seasons, Acts. xx. 18. And such a Divine power goes along with these living waters that they shall not be dried up, or the course of them be obstructed, either by the droughts in summer or the frosts in winter.

2. The kingdom of God among men shall be a universal and a united kingdom, ver. 9. 1st. It shall be a universal kingdom; "The Lord shall be king over all the earth." He is and ever was so of right; and in the sovereign disposals of his providence his kingdom doth rule over all, and none are exempt from his jurisdiction. But it is here promised that he shall be so by actual possession of the hearts of his subjects; he shall be acknowledged king by all, in all places; his authority shall be owned and submitted to, and allegiance sworn to him. This will have its accomplishment with that word, Rev. xi. 15, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ." 2nd. It shall be a united kingdom. "There shall be one Lord, and his name one." All shall worship one God only, and not idols, and shall be unanimous in the worship of him. All false gods shall be abandoned, and all false ways of worship abolished; and as God shall be the centre of their unity, in whom they shall all meet, so the Scripture shall be the rule of their unity, by which they shall all walk.

3. The land of Judæa and Jerusalem, its mother city, shall be repaired and replenished, and taken under the special protection of Heaven, ver. 10, 11. Some think this speaks particular favour to the people of the Jews, and points at their conversion and restoration in the latter days; but it is rather to be understood figuratively of the gospel church, typified by Judah and Jerusalem, and it signifies the abundant graces with which the church shall be crowned, and the fruitfulness of its members, and the vast numbers of them. 1st. The church shall be like a fruitful country, abounding in all the rich products of the soil. The whole land of Judæa, which is naturally uneven and hilly, shall be turned as a plain; it shall become a smooth level valley from Geba, or Gibeah, its utmost border north, to Rimmon, which lay south of Jerusalem, and was the utmost southern limit of Judæa. The Gospel of Christ, where it comes in its power, levels the ground. Mountains and hills are brought low by it, that the Lord alone may be exalted. 2nd. It shall be like a populous city. As the holy land shall be levelled, so the holy city shall be peopled, shall be rebuilt and replenished. Jerusalem shall be lifted up out of its low estate, shall be raised out of its ruins; when the land is turned as a plain, and not only the mount of Olives removed, ver. 4, but other mountains too, then Jerusalem shall be lifted up, that is, shall appear the more conspicuous. She shall be inhabited in her place, even in Jerusalem, ch. xii. 6. The whole city shall be inhabited in the utmost extent of it, and no part of it left to lie waste. The utmost limits of it are here mentioned, betwixt which there shall be no ground lost, but all built upon, from Benjamin's gate north-east to the corner gate north-west, and from the tower of Hananeel in the south to the king's winepresses in the north. When the churches of Christ in all places are replenished with great numbers of holy, humble, serious Christians, and many such are daily added to it, then this promise is fulfilled. 3rd. This country and this city shall both be safe, both the meat in the country and the mouths in the city. They that dwell in it shall dwell securely, and there shall be none to make them afraid; there shall be no more of that utter destruction that has laid both town and country waste; no more anathema, as some read it, no more cutting off, no more curse or separation from God to evil, no more such desolating judgments as you have been groaning under, but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited. There shall be no danger, nor any apprehension of it; neither shall its friends be fearful to disquiet themselves, nor its enemies formidable to disquiet them. That promise of Christ explains this, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church; and so doth that holy security and serenity of mind which believers enjoy in relying on the Divine protection.

Secondly. Here are judgments threatened against the enemies of the church, that have fought, or do fight against Jerusalem; and the threatening of these judgments is in order to the preservation of the church in safety. Men that read and hear of these plagues will be afraid of fighting against Jerusalem; much more, when these threatenings are fulfilled in some, will others hear and fear. Those that fight against the city of God and his people will be found fighting against God, against whom none ever hardened his heart and prospered; ver. 12, "This shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem;" whoever they are, God will punish them for the affront done, and avenge Jerusalem upon them.

1. They shall waste away under grievous and languishing diseases. "Their flesh shall consume away," and they shall be miserably emaciated even "while they stand on their feet," so that they shall be walking skeletons, nothing shall remain but skin and bone. The flesh which they pampered, and indulged, and made provision for, when they were fed to the full with the spoils of God's people, shall now "consume away that it cannot be seen, and the bones that were not seen shall stick out," Job xxxiii. 21. They keep their feet, and hope to keep their ground, crawling about as long as they can, but must yield at last. The organs of sight, the outlets of sin, their eyes, "shall consume away in their holes," shall sink into their heads, or perhaps start out of them; their envious, malicious, adulterous eyes, the eyes they had so often fed with spectacles of misery, these shall consume, which shall make not only their countenances ghastly but their lives wretched. The organs of speech, the outlets of sin, their tongue, "shall consume away in their mouth," whereby God will reckon with them for all their blasphemies against himself, and invectives against his people. Thus "their own tongue shall fall upon them," and their punishment shall be legible in their sin, as his was whose tongue was tormented in hell flames. Thus Antiochus and Herod consumed away.

2. They shall be dashed in pieces one against another; ver. 13, "A great tumult from the Lord shall be among them." But are tumults from the Lord, who is the God of order, and not of confusion? As they are the sin of those that raise them they are not from the Lord, but from the wicked one, and from men's own lusts; but as they are the punishment of those that suffer by them they are from the Lord, who serves his own purposes, and carries on his intentions, by the sins, and follies, and restless spirits of men. It is of themselves that they bite and devour one another; but it is of the Lord, the righteous judge, that thus they are "consumed one of another," Gal. v. 15. As Ahab was deceived by a lying spirit from the Lord, so Abimelech and the men of Shechem were divided, and so destroyed, by an evil spirit from the Lord, Jud. ix. 23. Note, Those that are confederate and combined against the church will justly be separated and set against one another; and their tumults raised against God will be avenged in tumults among themselves. And they shall "lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbour," to hold him from striking, or to bind him as his prisoner; nay, "his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbour," to strike and wound him. Note, Those that aim to destroy the church are often made to destroy one another; and every man's sword is sometimes set against his fellow by him whose sword they all are. Some think this was fulfilled in the factions and dissensions that were among the Jews when the Romans were destroying them all; for they had fought against the spiritual Jerusalem, the gospel church; and to that well enough agrees ver. 19, "Thou also, O Judah, shalt fight against Jerusalem;" that is, the Jewish nation shall be ruined by itself, shall die by its own hand; the city and country shall be at war with each other, and so both shall be destroyed. Suis et ipsa Roma viribus ruit,—'Rome was urged into ruin by its very strength.'

3. The plunder of their camp shall greatly enrich the people of God, or the spoils of their country; ver. 14, "Judah also shall eat at Jerusalem," so one learned interpreter reads it; people shall come from all parts to share in the prey. As when Sennacherib's army was routed before Jerusalem there was "the prey of a great spoil divided," Isa. xxxiii. 23, so it shall be now; the "wealth of all the heathen round about" that had spoiled "Jerusalem shall be gathered together, gold and silver, and apparel in great abundance," that an equal dividend may be made among all the parties entitled to a share of the prize. Note, The wealth of the sinner is often laid up for the just, and the Israel of God enriched with the spoil of the Egyptians.

4. The very cattle shall share in the plague with which the enemies of God's church shall be cut off, as they did in divers of the plagues of Egypt, ver. 15. All the beasts that shall be in the tents of these wicked men, when God comes to contend with them, shall perish with them. Not only beasts used in war, as the horse, but those used for travel or in the plough, as the mule, the camel, and the ass. Note, The inferior creatures often suffer for the sin of man, and in his plagues. Thus God will shew his indignation against sin, and will make the creature that is thus subject to vanity groan to be delivered into the glorious liberty of the children of God, Rom. viii. 21, 22.

16 And it shall come to pass,
That every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem
Shall even go up from year to year
To worship the King, the LORD of hosts,
And to keep the feast of tabernacles.
17 And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth
Unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the LORD of hosts,
Even upon them shall be no rain.
18 And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not,
That have no rain; there shall be the plague,
Wherewith the LORD will smite the heathen
That come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles.
19 This shall be the punishment of Egypt,
And the punishment of all nations
That come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles.
20 In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses,
HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD;
And the pots in the LORD's house shall be like the bowls before the altar.

BELLS ON MULES AND CAMELS.

21 Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah
Shall be holiness unto the LORD of hosts:
And all they that sacrifice
Shall come and take of them, and seethe therein.
And in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite
In the house of the LORD of hosts.

Three things are here foretold:—

First. That a gospel way of worship being set up in the church, there shall be a great resort to it, and a general attendance upon it. Those that were left of the enemies of religion shall be so sensible of the mercy of God to them in their narrow escape, that they shall apply themselves to the worship of the God of Israel, and pay their homage to him, ver. 16. Those that were not consumed shall be converted, and this makes their deliverance a mercy indeed, a double mercy. It is a great change that the grace of God makes upon them; they that had come against Jerusalem, finding their attempts vain and fruitless, shall become as much her admirers as ever they had been her adversaries, and shall come to Jerusalem to worship there, and go in concurrence with those whom they had gone contrary to. Note, Christ's foes, as some of them shall be made his footstool, so others of them shall be made his friends; and when the principle of enmity is slain in them, their former acts of hostility are pardoned to them, and their services are admitted and accepted, as though they had never fought against Jerusalem. They shall "go up to worship at Jerusalem," because that was the place that God had chosen, and there the temple was, which was a type of Christ and his mediation. Converting grace sets us right, 1. In the object of our worship. They shall no longer worship the Molochs and Baals, the kings and lords that the Gentiles worship, the creatures of their own imagination, but the King, the Lord of hosts, the everlasting King, the King of kings, the Sovereign Lord of all. 2. In the ordinances of worship, those which God himself hath appointed. Gospel worship is here represented by the "keeping of the feast of tabernacles," for the sake of those two great graces which were in a special manner acted and signified in that feast,—contempt of the world, and joy in God, Neh. viii. 17. The life of a good Christian is a constant feast of tabernacles; and in all acts of devotion we must retire from the world, and rejoice in the Lord, must worship as in that feast. 3. In the Mediator of our worship. We must go to Christ, our temple, with all our offerings, for in him only our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable to God, 1 Pet. ii. 5. If we rest in ourselves, we come short of pleasing God; we must go up to him, and mention his righteousness only. 4. In the time of it. We must be constant. They shall go up from year to year, at the times appointed for this solemn feast. Every day of a Christian's life is a day of the feast of tabernacles, and every Lord's day especially, that is the great day of the feast; and therefore every day we must worship the Lord of hosts, and every Lord's day with a peculiar solemnity.

Secondly. That those who neglect the duties of gospel worship shall be reckoned with for their neglect. God will compel them to come and worship before him, by suspending his favours from those that keep not his ordinances; upon them there shall be no rain, ver. 17. Some understand it figuratively: the rain of heavenly doctrine shall be withheld, and of the heavenly grace that should accompany that doctrine. God will "command the clouds that they rain no rain upon them." Note, It is a righteous thing with God to withhold the blessings of grace from those that do not attend the means of grace, to deny the green pastures to those that attend not the shepherds' tents. Or, we may take it literally: "On them there shall be no rain" to make their ground fruitful. Note, The gifts of common providence are justly denied to those that neglect and despise instituted ordinances. Those that neglected to build the temple were punished by want of rain, Hag. ii. 17; and so were they that neglected to attend there when it was built. If we be barren and unfruitful towards God, justly is the earth made so to us. Many are crossed and go backward in their affairs, and this is at the bottom of it—they do not keep close to the worship of God as they should; they go off from God, and then he walks contrary to them. If we omit or postpone the duties he expects from us, it is just with him to deny the favours we expect from him.

But what shall be done with the defaulters of the land of Egypt, to whom the threatening of the want of rain is no threatening, for they have no rain at any time? They need none, they desire none; the river Nilus is to them instead of the clouds of heaven, waters their land, and makes it fruitful, so that what is a punishment to others is none to them: ver. 18, 19, it is threatened that "if the family of Egypt go not up that have no rain," yet God will find out a way to meet with them, for there shall be in effect the same plague wherewith other nations are smitten for their neglect. God can, and often did, restrain the overflowing of the river, which was equivalent to the shutting up of the clouds; or if the river did its part, and rose as high as it used to do, God had other ways of bringing famine upon them, and destroying the fruits of their ground, as he did by divers of the ten plagues of Egypt; so that this (that is, the same) shall be the punishment of Egypt that is the punishment of other nations who come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles. Note, Those who think themselves least indebted to and depending on the mercy of heaven, yet cannot therefore think themselves guarded against the justice of heaven. Those that can live without rain, it doth not therefore follow they can live without God; for not the heavens only, but all other creatures, are that to us and no more that God makes them to be; nor can any man's way of living enable him to set light by the judgments of God. "This shall be the punishment;" margin, 'This shall be the sin of Egypt, and the sin of all nations, that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles.' The same word signifies both sin and the punishment of sin, so close and inseparable is the connexion between them, as Gen. iv. 7; and sin is often its own punishment. Note, Omissions are sins, and we must come into judgment for them; those contract guilt that go not up to worship at the times appointed, as they have opportunity, and it is a sin that is its own punishment; for those who forsake the duty forfeit the privilege of communion with God.

Thirdly. That those who perform the duties of gospel worship shall have grace to adorn their profession by the duties of a gospel conversation too. This is promised, ver. 20, 21, and it is necessary to the completing of the beauty and happiness of the church. In general, all shall be holiness to the Lord. 1. The name and character of holiness shall not be so confined as it had been. "Holiness to the Lord" had been written only upon the high priest's forehead; but now it shall not be so appropriated. All Christians shall be living temples, and spiritual priests, dedicated to the honour of God, and employed in his service. 2. Real holiness shall be more diffused than it had been; because there shall be more powerful means of sanctification, more excellent rules, more cogent arguments, and brighter patterns of holiness; and because there shall be a more plentiful effusion of the spirit of holiness and sanctification after Christ's ascension than ever before.

1st. There shall be holiness introduced into common things; and those things shall be devoted to God that seemed very foreign.

First. The furniture of their horses shall be consecrated to God. Upon the bells of the horses shall be engraven "Holiness to the Lord," or upon the bridles of the horses, so the margin, or the trappings. The horses used in war shall no longer be used against God and his people, as they have been, but for him and them. Even their wars shall be holy wars, their troopers serving under God's banners. Their great men, that ride in state with a pompous retinue, shall reckon it their greatest ornament to honour God with their honours; "Holiness to the Lord" shall be written on the harness of their chariot horses, as great men have sometimes their coat of arms with their motto painted on their coaches. Every gentleman shall take the high priest's motto for his, and glory in it, and make it a memento to himself, not to do any thing unworthy of it. Travellers shall have it upon their bridles with which they guide their horses, as those that desire always to be put in mind of it by having it continually before them, and to guide themselves in all their motions by this rule. The bells of the horses which are designed to quicken them in their journey, and to give notice of their approach, shall have "Holiness to the Lord" upon them, to signify that this is what we ought to be influenced by ourselves, and make profession of to others, wherever we go.

Secondly. The furniture of their houses too shall be consecrated to God, to be employed in his service. 1st. The furniture of the priests' houses, or apartments adjoining to the house of the Lord. The common drinking cups they used shall be "like the bowls before the altar," that were used either to receive the blood of the sacrifices or to present the wine and oil in, which were for the drink offerings. The vessels which they used at their own tables shall be used in such a religious manner, with such sobriety and temperance, such devotedness to the glory of God, and such a mixture of pious thoughts and expressions, that their meals shall look like sacrifices; they shall not eat and drink to themselves, but to Him that spreads their tables and fills their cups. And thus, in ministers' families especially, should common actions be done after a godly sort, however they are done in other families. 2nd. The furniture of other houses, those of the common people. "Every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness to the Lord;" the pots in which they boiled their meat, the cups out of which they drank their wine, Jer. xxxv. 5. In these God's good creatures shall never be abused to excess, nor that made the food and fuel of lust which should have been oil to the wheels of obedience, as had formerly been, when "all tables were full of vomit and filthiness," Isa. xxviii. 8. What they eat and drink out of these shall nourish their bodies for the service of God; and out of these they shall give liberally for the relief of the poor; then are they holiness to the Lord, as the merchandize and the hire of the converted Tyrians is said to be, Isa. xxiii. 11; for both in our gettings and in our spendings we must have an eye to the will of God as our rule, and the glory of God as our end. 3rd. Where there shall be such an abundance of real holiness people shall not be nice and curious about ceremonial holiness. "They that sacrifice shall come and take" of these common vessels, and seethe their sacrifices therein, making no distinction between them and the bowls before the altar. In gospel times the true worshippers shall worship God in spirit and in truth, and "neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem," Jno. iv. 21. One place shall be as acceptable to God as another, "I will that men pray every where," and one vessel as acceptable as another. Little regard shall be had to the circumstance, provided there be nothing indecent or disorderly, while the substance is religiously preserved and adhered to. Some think it intimates that there should be greater numbers of sacrifices offered than the vessels to the sanctuary would serve for; but, rather than any should be turned back or deferred, they shall make no difficulty at all of using common vessels, as the Levites, in a case of necessity, helped the priests to kill the sacrifices, 2 Chr. xxix. 34.

2nd. There shall be no unholiness introduced into their sacred things to corrupt them. "In that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." Some read it, There shall be no more 'the merchant;' for so a Canaanite sometimes signifies; and they think it was fulfilled when Christ once and again drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple. Or, though those that were Canaanites, strangers, and foreigners, shall be brought into the house of the Lord, yet they shall cease to be Canaanites; they shall have nothing of the spirit or disposition of Canaanites in them. Or, it intimates that though in gospel times people should grow indifferent as to holy vessels, yet they should be very strict in church discipline, and careful not to admit the profane to special ordinances, but to separate between the precious and the vile, between Israelites and Canaanites. Yet this will not have its full accomplishment short of the heavenly Jerusalem,—that house of the Lord of hosts into which no unclean thing shall enter; for, at the end of time, and not before, Christ shall gather out of his kingdom every thing that offends, and the tares and wheat shall be perfectly and eternally separated.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF ZECHARIAH.

CHAP. IV.—10. With those seven—they are the eyes of the Lord.

> For who hath despised the day of small things?
> For those seven eyes of Jehovah
> Which run to and fro through the whole earth rejoiced,
> When they saw the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel.

With the human estimate of the enterprise, forcibly expressed in the interrogative form, that of Jehovah is strikingly contrasted. His eyes rejoiced when they saw the work marked out by Zerubbabel with the plummet. This, which appears to me to be the only tenable construction, is that given in the margin by our translators. It relieves the passage from the burthen of fanciful conjectures which have been advanced in regard to the meaning, and brings out the simple but encouraging truth, that, how much soever men might despise the commencement of the work in which Zerubbabel and his compatriots were engaged, it was the object of peculiar regard and delight to Divine providence, which was acquainted with all human designs, and from its universal activity could not only defeat the machinations of enemies, but command the agency of those who should help forward the cause of truth and righteousness. Compare ch. iii. 9; 2 Chr. xvi. 9; Pr. xv. 3.—H.

CHAP. V.—8. And he said, This is wickedness. By the Hebrew word in this place is meant, idolatry, which was the most flagrant kind of wickedness with respect to God, and the fruitful parent of every other species of iniquity. 9. There came out two women. The two females here mentioned are regarded by Maurer and Hengstenberg as merely belonging, by way of colouring, to the symbol as such, two persons being required to carry so large a measure as the ephah. I should rather, however, infer that the Assyrian and Babylonian powers are intended, by which, as instruments, God removed idolatry in the persons of the apostate Hebrews out of the holy land. In this striking hieroglyphic we are taught how idolatry, with all its accompanying atrocities, was removed from the land of the Hebrews, which it had desecrated, to a country devoted to it, and where it was to commingle with its native elements, never to be re-imported into Canaan. How exactly has the prediction been fulfilled! From the time of the captivity to the present, a period of more than two thousand years, the Hebrew people have never once lapsed into idolatry! The whole vision was intended to convince them of the greatness of the evil.—H. See Supplementary Note on Hos. iii. 4.

CHAP. VI.—1. Four chariots. The import of this vision stands in close connexion with the foregoing. After (such is its simple meaning) Israel shall have been visited by severe Divine judgments, equally fearful chastisements shall be inflicted upon the instruments, which God had in part employed in the punishment of his people; upon all nations, from one end of the earth to the other. He sees four chariots. With respect to their import, he is taught by the declaration of the interpreting angel, ver. 5, 'These are the four winds of heaven, which go forth after they have appeared as ministers before the Lord of the whole earth.' The four winds of heaven serve as a symbol of the Divine judgments. From their personification is explained the circumstance that chariots are attributed to them, and that these are afterwards identified with the winds, of which they are to be considered as the vehicles. The figurative representation receives light from some passages of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, whom the prophet seems here, as commonly, without prejudice to his independence, to have imitated. The Divine judgments breaking in from all sides appear also, Jer. xlix. 36, under the image of the four winds: 'And I bring against Elam the four winds from the four ends of heaven, and I scatter them according to all these winds.' See also Eze. i. 12; Dan. vii. 2. From between two mountains—of brass. The chariots go forth from the two mountains, and these mountains are of brass. That the prophet had in view particularly the valley of Jehoshaphat appears from the parallel passage, ch. xiv. 4, where an extension of this valley, by the cleaving asunder of the mount of Olives, is promised. But why does the prophet, in order to designate the judgment as a consequence of the theocracy, make the four chariots go forth particularly from this valley of the mountains? Because it lay under the mountain of the temple, which was the dwelling-place of the Lord under the old covenant, and was the nearest place to it that was accessible to carriages. Here, therefore, (compare ver. 5,) the four winds of heaven stationed themselves, expecting the commands of the Lord. Wherefore were the two mountains called brazen? To indicate that the Lord surrounds his kingdom with a wall of protection, which can neither be scaled nor broken through. This truth was symbolized by the position of Jerusalem, as the Psalmist had already expressed it in the words, 'The mountains are round about Jerusalem, and the Lord surrounds his people.' In order to make the type more conformable to the reality, the prophet converts the mountains, which cover Jerusalem on the eastern side, into brass. 2. Red horses. The colour of the horses (as in the first chapter) indicates the destination of the chariots to execute judgment upon the enemies of God, red being the colour of blood, black that of mourning, white that of victory. Since no significant colour remained for the horses of the fourth chariot, the prophet was compelled to give them an unmeaning colour, 'speckled,' ['grisled,' E. T.,] and by a special epithet, 'strong,' to signify the attribute, which, in the case of the others, was already implied in the colour. The difficulty here, which has given occasion to the interpreters for the most forced explanations, is, that the black horses of the second chariot are mentioned first, and that the red of the first appear to be entirely passed over. On a nearer inspection, however, this difficulty entirely disappears; the red horses of the first chariot are here the strong, (disregard of the article is the chief cause of the errors of interpreters,) those in comparison with which the rest were to be regarded as weak, although in themselves considered they were strong, and had before in part been designated by the same epithet. These are mentioned last, because, feeling their power, and not satisfied like the rest with any particular portion of the earth, they desire permission of the Lord to go over the whole, whereby it is intended to express the thought that the judgment shall be strictly universal, no portion of the earth shall be exempted from it. 6. The north country. The chariot with the black, and that with the white horses, both go towards the north country. There must be a reason why this country is expressly mentioned, and two chariots depart for it. The inhabitants of the north country—according to constant usage the Babylonians and Assyrians—had been in times past the most dangerous enemies of the covenant people. They, therefore, served the prophet, in ch. v, as a type of their future enemies. In order now to express the thought, that, after the latter shall have returned again to the Lord, the former shall eminently experience the Divine chastisement, he makes the executioners of God's justice go forth in a peculiar manner towards the north country. That the north country is here to be understood, not properly, but typically, appears even from the foregoing chapter, where the prophet calls the country of those whose punishment is here announced the land of Shinar, not in a literal but in a figurative sense. The south country. On the south of Palestine dwelt the Egyptians, the first oppressors of Israel, who were elsewhere also combined by Zechariah with the enemies from the north, as a type of the future enemies of the covenant people. That only one chariot departs for them, represents them as comparatively less guilty, since their misconduct from length of time now appeared in a less striking light. The vision closes with an explanation of the Lord to the prophet, concerning the design of the departure of the chariots. 'Behold those which depart for the north country make mine anger to rest on the north country;' compare Eze. v. 13, 'I make mine anger rest,' and Zec. ix. 1, where the land of Hadrach and Damascus is represented as the resting-place of the Divine sentence of punishment, which included in itself the fulfilment. The explanation refers indeed, in the first instance, only to one part, (which, however, according to the above remarks, was the chief object of the Divine judgment,) but the prophet could easily deduce from this the destination of the rest sent forth under similar circumstances. 9. And the word of the Lord came unto me. The future developments of the kingdom of God, which the prophet had described in the preceding context, the judgment upon the former covenant people, as well as also, after their restoration, upon the remaining people of the earth, had their cause and source in the promised Anointed of the Lord, and presupposed his appearing. To fix the attention of the prophet, and through him that of the people, upon this point, it is once more presented to his inward contemplation towards the close of his ecstasy, and with this, as the last words indicate, at once lovely and terrific image the whole series of visions, whose collective contents in some way refer to it, is closed.

Chap. VII.—2, 3. When they had sent, &c. The congregation caused inquiry to be made by certain deputies, sent to the temple, whether they should continue to observe the fasts hitherto kept on the day of the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans, and which contained a penitential confession of guilt, and a prayer for forgiveness and restoration of the former prosperity. In this question there is at the same time included a supplication that God would very soon change the days of mourning into days of rejoicing. Therefore, it is said, the deputies have come to supplicate the Lord. Both inquiry and supplication presuppose that in the relations of the present there was ground to hope for a favourable future. But this can be shown to be the case in precisely the fourth year of Darius. The building of the temple had hitherto been unremittingly and successfully prosecuted. The new machinations of the Samaritans in the Persian court, with a design to arrest its progress, had been already completely defeated, (compare Prideaux.) The pusillanimity of the returned exiles was thus put to shame, and they gave themselves up henceforth to the most joyful hopes in reference to the future. The question was directed to the priests and prophets collected in the temple, in the hope that God would reveal his will by one of them. This was done through Zechariah. His answer consists of two parts. In the first, (ver. 5—14,) he employs himself in rebuking the base motive from which the question, at least with a part of the inquirers, originated. That dead, hypocritical self-righteousness already existed in the germ, which, continually gaining ground, became at a later period as destructive to the new colony as outward idolatry, resting on the same principle, had been in former times. This self-righteous spirit exerted the most prejudicial influence on the view entertained of fasts. They attributed an intrinsic value, as a mere opus operatum, to that which had no meaning, except as an outward manifestation of a penitent heart. They believed merit to be thereby attained, and wondered and murmured that God so long delayed to acknowledge and reward it. The prophet shews how absurd was this notion, and that the Lord required some thing entirely different, the fulfilment of the moral precepts of his law, without which all outward worship was only hypocrisy; he reminds them that the disregard of this requisition, loudly and repeatedly expressed by the former prophets, brought upon the people the previous inexpressible calamity, from which they had not yet recovered, and that a like cause would be attended with the like effect in future.

Chap. VIII.—1. Again the word of the Lord. This chapter contains the second part of the discourse, wherein the prophet proceeds to give a direct answer to the question, which could not now serve to confirm the hypocrites in their carnal security, but might well console and strengthen the weak in faith in his own and subsequent times, until the appearing of Christ. For the covenant people—this is the sum—so great prosperity is destined, that the day of the destruction of the temple, as well as the remaining fast days, at that time observed in remembrance of particular melancholy events of the past, the day of the capture of Jerusalem in the fourth, the day of the murder of Gedaliah in the seventh, and the day of the beginning of the siege in the tenth month, should be changed into days of rejoicing, because the future blessings would be far greater than those which had been lost. The prophet here also embraces the whole of the prosperity destined for the covenant people, and his prediction was first completely fulfilled in Christ. We must refer exclusively to the glorification, conferred through him upon the kingdom of God, the conclusion, ver. 20—23; where, as an enlargement upon Mic. iv. 2; Isa. iv. 3; Jer. xxxi. 6, the zeal of the heathen nations for admittance into the theocracy is described. (This and preceding Notes (on ch. vi. and vii.) from Hengstenberg's Christology.) 19—23. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, &c. At the time when Zechariah prophesied it was most unlikely that powerful nations, renowned for arts and arms, for civilization and for philosophy, which had conquered and oppressed Israel, and ridiculed the worship of Jehovah, should learn religion from that very people! Hitherto the Jews had been prone to learn the idolatries of other nations: what more improbable than that after they had been enslaved they should teach religion to their conquerors and all the principal nations of the earth? Yet this is expressly foretold, and it came to pass; for all the knowledge of the true God, and all the true religion in the world, may be traced back to the Jewish nation. But all the effects which have yet been seen are far beneath the language here used. Hitherto, however, the prophecy has been wonderfully accomplished, and no doubt future events will explain it further. The last verse is considered by many to indicate that numbers of converted Jews will be employed and prospered in the future conversion of the Gentiles.

Chap. IX.—3—6. See Supplementary Notes on Isa. xxiii., and Zep. ii. 10. I will cut off. The prophet proceeds to give the characteristic difference of the Messianic kingdom from all worldly kingdoms, and especially from the former theocracy, whether with special reference to the carnal conceptions of his contemporaries is uncertain. While earthly kingdoms are upheld and extended only by the power of arms, while even the theocracy formerly employed them, it shall in the time of the Messiah be deprived of every external weapon, since it will need them no more, because its head, the Prince of peace, by his bare word extends peace over the whole earth, which willingly and joyfully submits to him.

Chap. XII.—12. So they weighed for my price. This doubtless is the passage quoted by Matthew, ch. xxvii. 5, but there ascribed to Jeremiah. See M. Henry's remarks on Matthew. To what is there stated we may add, that some have thought there was a mistake made by ancient transcribers writing the name Jeremiah instead of Zechariah, and it is observed that this might be done by only the change of a single letter. It was often the custom to abridge words in writing them. Thus, instead of writing the name of Jeremiah in full, it would be written in Greek Ιριου; so Zechariah would be written Ζριου. By the mere change of Z into I, therefore, the mistake might easily have been made.—Barnes.

Chap. XII.—10. Upon me. Dr. J. P. Smith and Dr. Henderson successfully oppose those who translate this 'unto him;' and, as Jehovah declares himself to be the person thus pierced, it follows that there is such unity between the suffering man and the eternal God as, without confounding the properties of each nature, renders it proper for the Divine Being to use this personal style. 11. Hadadrimmon, in the valley of Megiddon, is considered to denote the plain of Esdraelon. The mourning referred to here is the lamentation for the death of Josiah, who was slain there. This remarkable district is computed to be about fifteen miles square, and abounds with hills, though small in comparison with the neighbouring mountains. It has been the scene of innumerable contests, from the days of Barak, Jud. iv., to the present time. (See Wood Engraving.)

Chap. XIII.—7. My shepherd—the man that is my fellow. The Messiah is often described as the Shepherd of his people—their Saviour. Against him the sword, described as an instrument of certain death, is commanded to awake. The word translated "my fellow" denotes the most close and near resemblance. It is derived from a term denoting a sameness of internal construction. It is not found in any writings of the Old Testament between those of Moses and Zechariah. We may therefore conclude it was revived from apparent obsoleteness by him who inspired the prophet, from a very special motive, and to make a singular and strong expression. Not only here is attributed to the Messiah a high official station in the kingdom of grace, and a capacity, by possessing the human nature, to suffer and to die, but an actual equality of rank and identity of nature.—J. P. Smith, as quoted (with the two previous Notes,) in Religious Tract Society's Bible.

AN

EXPOSITION

PROPHECY OF MALACHI,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

God's prophets were his witnesses to his church, each in their day, for several ages; witnesses for him and his authority, witnesses against sin and sinners, attesting the true intents of God's providences in his dealings with his people then, and the kind intentions of his grace concerning his church in the days of the Messiah, to whom all the prophets bore witness, for they all agreed in their testimony; and now we have only one witness more to call, and we have done with our evidence; and though he be the last, and in him the prophecy ceased, yet the spirit of prophecy shines as clear, as strong, as bright in him, as in any that went before, and his testimony challengeth an equal regard. The Jews say prophecy continued forty years under the second temple, and this prophet they call the seal of prophecy, because in him the series or succession of prophets broke off and came to a period: God wisely ordered it so that Divine inspiration should cease for some ages before the coming of the Messiah, that that great Prophet might appear the more conspicuous and distinguishable, and be the more welcome. Let us consider, I. The person of the prophet. We have only his name, Malachi, and no account of his country or parentage. Malachi signifies 'my angel;' which has given occasion for a conjecture that this prophet was indeed an angel from heaven, and not a man; as that Jud. ii. 1. But there is no just ground for the conjecture: prophets were messengers, God's messengers; this prophet was so. His name is the very same with that we find in the original, ch. iii. 1, for my messenger; and perhaps from that word he might (though probably he had another name) be called Malachi. The Chaldee paraphrase, and some of the Jews, suggest that Malachi was the same with Ezra, but that also is groundless; Ezra was a scribe, but we never read that he was a prophet. Others, yet farther from probability, make him to be Mordecai. But we have reason to conclude he was a person whose proper name was that by which he is here called; the tradition of some of the ancients is that he was of the tribe of Zebulun, and that he died young. II. The scope of the prophecy. Haggai and Zechariah were sent to reprove the people for delaying to build the temple, Malachi was sent to reprove them for the neglect of it when it was built, and for their profanation of the temple service; for from idolatry and superstition they ran into the other extreme of impiety and irreligion; and the sins he witnesseth against are the same that we find complained of in Nehemiah's time, with whom it is probable he was cotemporary. And now prophecy was to cease he speaks more clearly of the Messiah as nigh at hand than any of the prophets had done, and concludes with a direction to the people of God to keep in remembrance the law of Moses, while they were in expectation of the Gospel of Christ.

CHAPTER I.

This prophet is sent to convince, and then to comfort; first to discover sin, and reprove for that, and then to promise the coming of him who shall take away sin; and this method the blessed Spirit takes in dealing with souls, Jno. xvi. 8. He first opens the wound and then applies the healing balm. God had provided (and one would think effectually) for the engaging of Israel to himself, by providences and ordinances; but it seems, by the complaints here made of them, they received the grace of God in both these in vain. I. They were very ungrateful to God for his favours to them, and rendered not again according to the benefits they received, ver. 1—5. II. They were very careless and remiss in the observance of his institutions; the priests especially were so, that were in a particular manner charged with them, ver. 6—14. And what shall we say of those whom neither providences nor ordinances work upon, and who affront God in those very things wherein they should honour him?

THE burden of the word of the LORD to Israel by Malachi.

2 I have loved you, saith the LORD.
Yet ye say, Wherein hast thou loved us?
Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the LORD:
Yet I loved Jacob,
3 And I hated Esau,
And laid his mountains and his heritage waste
For the dragons of the wilderness.
4 Whereas Edom saith, We are impoverished,
But we will return and build the desolate places;
Thus saith the LORD of hosts,
They shall build, but I will throw down;
And they shall call them, The border of wickedness,
And, The people against whom the LORD hath indignation for ever.
5 And your eyes shall see, and ye shall say,
The LORD will be magnified from the border of Israel.

The prophecy of this book is intituled, "The burden of the word of the Lord," (ver 1,) which intimates, 1. That it was of great weight and importance: what the false prophets said was light as the chaff, what the true prophets said was ponderous as the wheat, Jer. xxiii. 28. 2. That it ought to be often repeated to them and by them, as the burthen of a song. 3. That there were those to whom it was a burthen and a reproach; they were weary of it, and found themselves so aggrieved by it that they were not able to bear it. 4. That to them it would prove a burthen indeed, to sink them to the lowest hell, unless they repented. 5. That to those who loved and embraced, and bade it welcome, though it was a light burden, as our Saviour calls it, Mat. xi. 30, yet it was a burthen. This "burden of the word of the Lord" was sent, 1st. To Israel; for to them pertained the lively oracles of prophecy, as well as those of the written word. Many prophets God had sent to Israel, and now he will try them with one more. 2nd. By Malachi; by the hand of Malachi,—as if it were not a message by word of mouth, but a letter put into his hand, for the greater certainty.

In these verses they are charged with ingratitude in that they were not duly sensible of God's distinguishing goodness to them; and such a charge as this may well be called a burthen, for it is a heavy one.

First. God asserts the great kindness he had, and had often expressed, for them; ver. 2, "I have loved you, saith the Lord." Thus abruptly doth the sermon begin, as if God intended whatever reproofs should be given them to reconcile them to his love, and to take care that they should still have good thoughts of him; "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten." Thus kindly doth the sermon begin; God will have his people satisfied that he loves them, and ever mindful of his love. This is the same with that he said of old to the virgin of Israel, that he might engage her affections to himself, Jer. xxxi. 3, 4, "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love." In this one word God sums up all his gracious dealings with them; love was the spring of all. He loved them because he would love them, Deu. vii. 7, 8; loved them in their childhood, Hos. xi. 1; his delight was in them, Isa. lxii. 4. "I have loved you," but you have not loved me, nor made any suitable returns for my love. Note, God's people need to be often minded of his love to them.

Secondly. They question his love, and diminish the instances of it, and seem to quarrel with him for telling them of it. "Yet they say, Wherein hast thou loved us?" As God runs up all his favours to them to the fountain, which was his love, so he runs up all their sins against him to the fountain, which was their contempt of his love. Instead of acknowledging his kindness, and studying what they shall render, they scorn to own that they had been beholden to him; challenge him to produce proofs of his love that were material, and think and speak very slightly of the instances they had had of his kindness, as if they were so few, so small, as not to be worth taking notice of, and no more than what they had sufficiently balanced with instances of his wrath: Have we not been wasted, impoverished, and carried captive, and wherein then hast thou loved us? Note, God justly takes it very ill to have his favours slighted, as not worth speaking of; and it is very absurd for us to ask wherein he has loved us, when which way soever we look we meet with the proofs and instances of his love to us.

Thirdly. He makes it out beyond contradiction that he had loved them, loved them in a distinguishing way, which was in a special manner obliging. For proof of this he shews the difference he had made, and would still make, between Jacob and Esau, between Israelites and Edomites. Some read their question, Wherefore hast thou loved us? As if they did indeed own that he had loved them, but withal insinuate that there was a reason for it, that he loved them because their father Abraham had loved him, so that it was not a free love, but a love of debt; to which he replies, Was not Esau as near akin to Abraham as you are, was he not Jacob's own brother, his elder brother? and, therefore, if there were any right to a recompence for Abraham's love, he had it. And yet I hated Esau and loved Jacob.

1. Let them see what a difference God had made between Jacob and Esau. Esau was Jacob's brother, his twin brother; "Yet I loved Jacob," and "I hated Esau," that is, took Jacob into covenant, and entailed the blessings on him and his, but I refused and rejected Esau. Note, Those that are taken into covenant with God, that have the lively oracles and the means of grace committed to them, have reason to look upon these as tokens of his love. Jacob is loved, for he hath these; Esau hated, for he has not. The apostle quotes this, Rom. ix. 13, and compares it with what the oracle said to Rebecca concerning her twins, Gen. xxv. 23, "The elder shall serve the younger," to illustrate the doctrine of God's sovereignty in dispensing his favours, for "man he not do what he will with his own?" Esau was justly hated, but Jacob freely loved; even so, Father, "because it seems good in thine eyes;" and it is not for us to ask why or wherefore.

2. Let them see what he was now doing, and would do with them, pursuant to this original difference.

1st. The Edomites shall be made the monuments of God's justice, and he will be glorified in their utter destruction; For Esau have I hated; "I laid his mountains waste," the mountains of Seir, which were his heritage. When all that part of the world was ravaged by the Chaldean army, the country of Edom was among the rest laid in ruins, and became a habitation "for the dragons of the wilderness," so perfectly desolate was it, as was foretold, Isa. xxxiv. 6, 11. The Edomites had triumphed in Jerusalem's overthrow, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, and, therefore, it was just with God to put the same cup of trembling into their hands. And though Edom's ruins were last, yet they were lasting, and the desolations perpetual; and in this the difference was made between Jacob and Esau, and is made between the righteous and the wicked, to whom otherwise all things come alike, and there seems to be one event. Jacob's cities are laid waste, but they are rebuilt; Edom's are laid waste, and never rebuilt. The sufferings of the righteous will have an end, and will end well, all their grievances will be redressed, and their sorrow turned into joy; but the sufferings of the wicked will be endless and remediless, as Edom's desolations, ver. 4. Observe here, First. The vain hopes of the Edomites that they shall have their ruins repaired as well as Israel, though they had no promise to build their hope upon. They say, It is true we are impoverished; it is the common chance, and there is no remedy, but "we will return and build the desolate places." We are resolved we will, not so much as asking God leave; we will, whether he will or no; nay, we will do it in defiance of God's curse, and that sentence pronounced upon Edom, Isa. xxxiv. 10, "From generation to generation it shall lie waste." They build presumptuously, as Hiel built Jericho in direct contradiction to the word of God, 1 Kin. xvi. 34, and it will speed accordingly. Note, It is common for those whose hearts are unhumbled under humbling providences to think to make their part good against God himself, and to build and plant, and flourish again as much as ever, though God hath said they shall be impoverished. But see, Secondly. The dashing of these hopes, and the disappointment of them. They say, We will build; but what saith the Lord of hosts? for we are sure his word shall stand, and not theirs. And he saith, 1*st.* Their attempts shall be baffled; "They shall build, but I will throw down." Note, Those that walk contrary to God, he will walk contrary to them; for who ever hardened his heart against God and prospered? When the Jews had rejected Christ and his Gospel they became Edomites, and this word was fulfilled in them; for when, in the time of the emperor Adrian, they attempted to rebuild Jerusalem, God by earthquakes and eruptions of fire threw down what they built, so that they were forced to quit the enterprise. 2*nd.* They shall be looked upon by all as abandoned to utter ruin. All that see them shall call them the border of wickedness, a sinful nation, incurably so; and, therefore, "the people against whom the Lord has indignation for ever." Since their wickedness is such as will never be reformed, their desolations shall be such as are never to be repaired. Against Israel God was a little displeased, Zec. i. 15; but against Edom he has indignation, and will have for ever, for they are the people of his curse, Isa. xxxiv. 5.

2nd. The Israelites shall be made the monuments of his mercy, and he will be glorified in their salvation, ver. 5. Edomites shall be stigmatised as a people hated of God, but your eyes shall see your doubts concerning his love to you for ever silenced; for you shall say, and have cause to say, "The Lord" is and "will be magnified from the border of Israel," that is, from every part and border of the land of Israel. The border of Edom is a border of wickedness, and, therefore, the Lord will have "indignation against it for ever;" but the border of Israel is a border of holiness, the border of the sanctuary, Ps. lxxviii. 54, and therefore God will make it to appear, though it may for a time lie desolate, that he hath mercy in store for it, and from thence he will be magnified; he will give his people Israel both cause and hearts to praise him. When the border of Edom still remains desolate, and the border of Israel is repaired and replenished, then it will appear that God hath loved Jacob. Note, First. Those that doubt of God's love to his people shall sooner or later have convincing and undeniable proofs given them of it; your own eyes shall see what you will not believe. Secondly. Deliverances out of trouble are to be reckoned proofs of God's goodwill to his people, though they may be suffered to fall into trouble, Ps. xxxiv. 19. Thirdly. Distinguishing favours are very obliging. If God rear up again the border of Israel, but leave the border of Edom in ruins, let no Israelite ask, for shame, Wherein hast thou loved us? Fourthly. The dignifying of Israel is the magnifying of the God of Israel, and one way or other God will have honour from his professing people. Fifthly. God's goodness being his glory, when he doth us good we must speak him great, for that is magnifying him. It is an instance of his goodness that he hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servants, and for this they that love his salvation say, "The Lord be magnified," Ps. xxxv. 27.

And a servant his master:
If then I be a father, where is mine honour?
And if I be a master, where is my fear?
Saith the LORD of hosts unto you,
O priests, that despise my name.
And ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name?
7 Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar;
And ye say, Wherein have we polluted thee?
In that ye say, The table of the LORD is contemptible
8 And if ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil?
And if ye offer the lame and sick, is it not evil?
Offer it now unto thy governor;
Will he be pleased with thee,
Or accept thy person? saith the LORD of hosts.
9 And now, I pray you,
Beseech God that he will be gracious unto us:
This hath been by your means:
Will he regard your persons? saith the LORD of hosts.
10 Who is there even among you that would shut the doors for nought?
Neither do ye kindle fire on mine altar for nought.
I have no pleasure in you, saith the LORD of hosts,
Neither will I accept an offering at your hand.
11 For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same
My name shall be great among the Gentiles;
And in every place incense shall be offered unto my name,
And a pure offering:
For my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the LORD of hosts.
12 But ye have profaned it, in that ye say,
The table of the LORD is polluted;
And the fruit thereof, even his meat, is contemptible.
13 Ye said also, Behold, what a weariness is it!
And ye have snuffed at it, saith the LORD of hosts;
And ye brought that which was torn, and the lame, and the sick;
Thus ye brought an offering:
Should I accept this of your hand? saith the LORD.
14 But cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male,
And voweth, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing:
For I am a great King, saith the LORD of hosts,
And my name is dreadful among the heathen.

The prophet is here by a special commission calling the priests to account, though they were themselves appointed judges to call the people to an account. Let the rulers in the house of God know that there is one above them, who will reckon with them for their maladministrations. Thus "saith the Lord of hosts to you, O priests," ver. 6. God will have a saying to unfaithful ministers; and it concerns them who speak from God to his people to hear and heed what he saith to them, that they may save themselves in the first place, otherwise how should they help to save them that hear them. It is a severe, and no doubt a just reproof, that is here given to the priests for the profanation of the holy things of God with which they were intrusted; and if this was the crime of the priests, we have reason to fear the people also were guilty of it, so that what is said to the priests is said to all. Nay, it is said to us, who, as Christians, profess ourselves not only the people of God, but priests to him. Observe here,

First. What it was that God expected from them, and with what good reason he expected it; ver. 6, "A son honoureth his father" because he is his father. Nature has written this law in the hearts of children, before God wrote it at mount Sinai; nay, a servant, though his obligation to his master be not natural, but by voluntary compact, yet thinks it is his duty to honour him, to be observant to his orders, and true to his interests. Children and servants pay respect to their parents and masters; every one cries out Shame on them, if they do not, and their own hearts cannot but reproach them too. The order of families is thus kept up, and it is their beauty and advantage. But the priests, that are God's children and his servants, do not fear and honour him. They were fathers and masters to the people, and expected to be called so, (Jud. xviii. 19; Mat. xxiii. 7, 10,) and to be reverenced and obeyed as such; but they forgot their Father and Master in heaven, and the duty they owe to him. We may each of us charge it upon ourselves what is here charged upon the priests. Note, 1. We are every one of us to look upon God as our Father and Master, and upon ourselves as his children and servants. 2. Our relation to God as our Father and Master strongly obligeth us to fear and honour him. If we honour and fear the fathers of our flesh, much more the Father and Master of our spirits, Heb. xvii. 9. 3. It is a thing to be justly complained of and lamented, that God is so little feared and owned, even by those that own him for their Father and Master. Where is his honour? Where is his fear?

Secondly. What the contempt was which these priests put upon God. This is that in general which is charged upon them. 1. They despised God's name. Their familiarity with it, as priests, bred contempt of it, and served them only to gain a veneration by for themselves, and their own name, while God's name was of small account with them. God's name is all that whereby he has made himself known, his word and ordinances; these they had low thoughts of, and vilified that which it was their business to magnify; and no wonder that when they despised it themselves they did that which made it despicable to others, even the sacrifices of the Lord to be abhorred, as Eli's sons did. 2. They profaned God's name, ver. 12; they polluted it, ver. 7. They not only made no account of sacred things, but they made an ill use of them, and perverted them to the service of the worst and vilest purposes, their own pride, covetousness and luxury. There cannot be a greater provocation to God than the profanation of his name; for it is holy and reverend. His purity cannot be polluted by us, for he is unspotted, but his name may be profaned, and nothing profanes it more than the misconduct of priests, whose business it is to do honour to it.

This is the general charge exhibited against them; to this they plead, Not guilty, and challenge God to prove it upon them, and to make good the charge; which added daring impudence to their daring impiety: "Ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name?" ver. 6; and "Wherein have we polluted thee?" ver. 7. It is common with proud sinners, when they are reproved, to stand thus upon their own justification. These priests had most horribly profaned sacred things, and yet, like the adulterous woman, say they have done no wickedness; either they were so unobservant of themselves that they remembered not, or reflected not upon their own acts, or so ignorant of the Divine law that they thought there was no harm in them, and that what they did could not be construed as despising God's name, or so atheistical as to imagine that though they knew their own guilt yet God did not, or so scornful in their carriage towards God and his prophets, that they took a pride in bantering a serious and just reproof, and turning it off with a jest. They either laugh at the reproof, as those that despise and harden their hearts against it, or laugh it off, as those that resolve they will not be touched by it, or not seem to be so. Which way soever we take it, their defence was their offence, and in justifying themselves, their own tongues condemned them; and their saying, "Wherein have we despised thy name?" proved them proud and perverse. Had they asked this question with a humble desire to be told more particularly wherein they had offended, it had been an evidence of their repentance, and had given hopes of their reformation; but to ask it thus, in disdain and defiance of the word of God, argues their hearts "fully set in them to do evil." Note, Sinners ruin themselves by studying to baffle their own convictions; but they will find it hard to kick against the pricks. Justly might they have been convicted and condemned upon the general charge, and their plea thrown out as frivolous; but God will not only overcome, but will be clear, will be justified when he judgeth, and therefore he shews them very particularly wherein they had despised his name, and what the contempt was they cast upon him. As formerly when he charged them with idolatry, so now, when he chargeth with profaneness, he bids them "see their way in the valley," and know what they have done, Jer. ii. 23.

1st. They despised God's name in what they said, in the low opinion they had of his institutions. Ye say in your hearts, and perhaps speak it out when you priests get together, over your cups, out of the hearing of the people, "The table of the Lord is contemptible," ver. 7; and again, ver. 12, "Ye say, The table of the Lord is polluted;" it is to be no more regarded than any other table. Either the table in the temple on which the shewbread was placed is that which they reflect upon,—not understanding the mystery of it they despised it as an insignificant thing,—or, rather, the altar of burnt offerings is here called the table; for there God and his priests, and his people, did, as it were, feast together upon the sacrifices, in token of friendship: this they thought was contemptible. Formerly, in the days of superstition, it was thought contemptible in comparison with the idolatrous altars that the heathen had, and was set aside to make room for a new fashioned one, 2 Kin. xvi. 14, 15. Now it is thought contemptible in comparison with their own tables, and those of their great men; "The fruit thereof, even his meat, is contemptible." They who served at the altar were to live upon the altar, but they complained that they lived poorly and meanly, and it was not worth while to attend the service of the altar for the fruit and meat of it, for it was very ordinary, and always the same again; they had no dainties, no varieties, no nice dishes. Nay, that part of the sacrifices which was given to God, the blood and the fat, they looked upon with contempt, as not worthy so many laws God had made about them; they asked what needs so much ado about burning the fat, and pouring out the blood! Note, Those greatly profane and pollute God's name that despise the business of religion, though it be very honourable, as not worth taking pains in; and the advantages of religion, though highly valuable, as not worth taking pains for. Those that live in a careless neglect of holy ordinances, that come to them and attend on them irreverently, and go away from them never the better, and under no concern, they do in effect say, "The table of the Lord is contemptible," there is neither virtue nor value in it, neither credit nor comfort from it.

2nd. They despised God's name in what they did, which was of a piece with what they said, and flowed from it; corrupt principles and notions are roots of bitterness which bear the gall and wormwood of corrupt practices. They looked upon the table and altar of the Lord as contemptible, and then,

First. They thought any thing would serve for a sacrifice, though never so coarse and mean; and were so far from bringing the best, as they ought to have done, that they picked out the worst they had, which was fit neither for the market nor for their own tables, and offered that at God's altar. With every sacrifice they were to bring a meat offering of fine flour mingled with oil; but they brought polluted bread, ver. 7, coarse bread, servants' bread. Perhaps it was dry and mouldy, or made of the refuse of the wheat, which they thought good enough to be burned upon the altar; for had it been better they would have said, To what purpose is this waste? And as to the beasts they offered, though the law was express that what was offered in sacrifice should not have blemish, yet they brought "the blind, and the lame, and the sick," ver. 5; and again, ver. 13, the torn, and the lame, and the sick, that was ready to die of itself. They looked no farther than the burning of the sacrifice, and they pleaded it was pity to burn it if it was good for any thing else. The people were so far convinced of their duty that they would bring sacrifices; they durst not wholly omit the duty, but they brought vain oblations, mocked God, and deceived themselves, by bringing the worst they had; and the priests, who should have taught them better, accepted the gifts brought to the altar, and offered them up there, because if they should refuse them the people would bring none at all, and then they would lose their perquisites; and therefore, having more regard to their own profit than to God's honour, they accepted that which they knew he would not accept of. Some make ver. 8 to be a continuation of what the priests profanely said, ver. 7, "Ye say" to the people, "If ye offer the blind for sacrifice, it is not evil; or the lame and the sick, it is not evil." Note, It is a very evil thing, whether men think so or no, to offer the blind and the lame, the torn and the sick, in sacrifice to God. If we worship God ignorantly, and without understanding, we bring the blind for sacrifice; if we do it carelessly, and without consideration, if we are cold and dull, and dead in it, we bring the sick; if we rest in bodily exercises, and do not make heart work of it, we bring the lame; and if we suffer vain thoughts and distractions to lodge within us, we bring the torn. And is not this evil? Is it not a great affront to God, and a great wrong and injury to our own souls? Do not our books tell us, nay, do not our own hearts tell us, that this is evil? For God, who is the best, ought to be served with the best we have.

Secondly. They would do no more of their work but what they were paid for. The priests would offer the sacrifices that were brought to the altar, because they had their share of them; but as for any other service of the temple, that had not a particular fee belonging to it, they would not stir a step, or lend a hand to it; and this was the general temper of them, ver. 10. There is not a man among the priests that would shut the doors or kindle a fire for nought. If he were bid to do the smallest piece of service, he would ask, How shall I be paid for it? They would do nothing gratis, but were all for what they could get; "every one for his gain, from his quarter," Isa. lvi. 11. Note, Though God has given order that his servants be well paid in this world, yet those are no acceptable servants to him that are mercenary, and would never do the work but for the wages.

Thirdly. Their work was a perfect drudgery to them; ver. 13, "Ye said also, Behold, what a weariness is it!" Both priests and people were of this mind, that they thought God imposed too hard a task upon them; the people grudged the charge of providing the sacrifice, and the priests grudged the pains of offering it; they thought the feasts of the Lord came too thick, and they were forced to attend too often, and too long, in the courts of the Lord. The priests thought it a severe penance imposed upon them to purify themselves as was required, when they attended the altar, and ate of the holy things; they thought the duty of their office toilsome and troublesome, and snuffed at it as unreasonable, and bearing hard upon them; they did it, but it was grudgingly, and with reluctancy. God speaks of it in justification of his law, that he had not "made them to serve with an offering, nor wearied them with incense," Isa. xliii. 23; "Wherein have I wearied thee?" Mic. vi. 3. But their own wicked hearts made it a weariness; and they were as Doeg, detained before the Lord, they would rather have been anywhere else. Note, Those are highly injurious both to God and themselves that are weary of his service and worship, and snuff at it.

Thirdly. Observe how God expostulates and reasons the case with them, for their conviction and humiliation.

1. Would they, durst they, affront an earthly prince thus? You offer to God "the lame and the sick, offer it now unto thy governor," ver. 8; either as tribute or as a present, when thou art entreating his favour, or in gratitude for some favour received; "will he be pleased with thee?" or rather will he not take himself to be affronted by it? Note, Those that are careless and irreverent in the duties of religious worship should consider what a shame it is to offer that to their God which they would scorn to offer to their governor, and to be more observant of the laws of breeding and good manners than of the laws of religion, and more afraid of being rude than of being profane.

2. Could they imagine that such sacrifices as these would be pleasing to God, or answer the end of sacrifices? "Should I accept this of your hand, saith the Lord?" ver. 13. Have you any reason to think I should either not discern or not resent the affront? that I should connive at the violation of my own laws? No; ver. 10, "I have no pleasure in you," and therefore I will not accept an offering, such an offering, at your hand. If God has no pleasure in the person, if he be not in a justified state, if he be not sanctified, he will not accept the offering; God had respect to Abel first, and then to his sacrifice. Note, In order to our acceptance with God, it is not enough to do that which, for the matter of it, is good, but we must do it from a right principle, in a right manner, and for a right end. It was the ancient rule laid down, Gen. iv. 7, "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" Now if we be not accepted of God, in vain do we worship him,—it is all lost labour; nay, we are all undone, for ever undone, if we come short of God's acceptance; those therefore make an ill bargain for themselves, that, to save charges in their religion, miss all the ends of it, and, by thinking to go the next way to work, bring nothing to pass. Those who make it the top of their ambition, as we all ought to do, whether present or absent, to be accepted of the Lord, will not dare to bring the torn, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice.

3. How could they expect to prevail with God in their intercessions for the people, when they thus affronted God in their sacrifices? So some understand ver. 9, as spoken ironically: And now, if you will do the duty of priests, and stand in the gap to turn away the judgments of God that you see ready to pour in upon us, "I pray you, beseech God that he will be gracious to us," and to our land, which is almost eaten up with locusts and caterpillars, as appears ch. iii. 11. Try now what interest you have at the throne of grace, improve it for the removing of this plague, for it has been by your means, you have provoked God to send it; but, as you go on thus to profane his sacred things, will he regard your persons or your prayers? No, you cannot prevail with him to command it away. For "if we regard iniquity in our hearts God will not hear us," either for ourselves or others.

4. Had God deserved this at their hands? No, he had provided comfortably for them, and had given them such encouragement in their work as might have engaged them to do it cheerfully and well; so some understand ver. 10, "Who is there among you that shall shut a door or kindle a fire for nought?" No, God doth not expect you should serve him for nothing; you are well paid for it, and shall be so,—not a cup of cold water given for the honour of God shall lose its reward. Note, The consideration of our constant receivings from God, and the present rewards of obedience in obedience, very much aggravates our slothfulness and niggardliness in our returns of duty to God.

Fourthly. He calls them to repentance for their profanations of his holy name. So we may understand ver. 9, "Now, I pray you, beseech God that he will be gracious to us." Humble yourselves for your sin, cry mightily to God for pardon, and make up in the faith and fervency of your prayers what has been wanting in the worth and value of your sacrifices; for all the rebukes of Providence we are under are by your means. Note, Those that have by their sins helped to kindle a fire are highly concerned by their repentance, prayers, and personal reformation, to help to quench it. We must see how much God's judgments are by our means, and be awakened thereby to be earnest with him to return in mercy; and if we take not this course how can we think he should regard our persons!

Fifthly. He declares his resolution both to secure the glory of his own name and to reckon with those that do profane it. Those that put contempt upon God and religion, and think to run down sacred things, let them know,

1. That they shall not gain their point. God will magnify his law, and make it honourable, though they vilify it and make it contemptible; for, ver. 11, "From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same my name shall be great among the Gentiles." It might be said, If these be not the worshippers whom God will accept, then he has no worshippers; as if he must make the best of their service, or else he would have no service done him; and then what will he do for his great name? But let him alone for that: though Israel be not faithful, be not gathered, yet God will be glorious; though these priests provoke him to take down the ceremonial economy, and to abolish that law of commandments which "could not make the comers thereunto perfect," yet he will be no loser by that at the long run; for, 1st. Instead of those carnal ordinances which they profaned, a spiritual way of worship shall be introduced and established. "Incense shall be offered to God's name," which signifies prayer and praise, (Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. viii. 3,) instead of the blood and fat of bulls and goats. And it shall be a pure offering, refined, not only from the corruptions that were in the priests' practice, but from the mere bodily exercise that was in the institutions themselves, which are called "carnal ordinances, imposed till the time of reformation," Heb. ix. 10. When the hour came in which "the true worshippers worshipped the Father in spirit and in truth," then this incense was offered, even this pure offering. 2nd. Instead of his being worshipped and served among the Jews only, a small people in a corner of the world, he will be served and worshipped in all places. "From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, in every place," in every part of the world, "incense shall be offered to his name," nations shall be discipled, and shall speak of the wonderful works of God, and have them spoken to them in their own language. This is a plain prediction of that great revolution in the kingdom of grace by which the Gentiles that had been strangers and foreigners came to be fellow-citizens with the saints of the household of God, and as welcome to the throne of grace as ever the Jews had been. It is twice said, for the thing was certain, "My name shall be great among the Gentiles," whereas hitherto in Judah only he was known, and his name great, Ps. lxxvi. 1. God's name shall be declared to them, the declaration of it shall be received and believed, and there shall be those among the Gentiles that shall magnify and glorify the name of God better than ever the Jews had done, even the priests themselves.

2. That they shall "not go unpunished," ver. 4. Here is the doom of those that do like these priests here, for the sentence on them is a sentence on all such. Observe, 1st. The description of profane and careless worshippers. They are such as "vow and sacrifice to the Lord a corrupt thing," when they have in their flock a male. They have of the best wherewith to serve and honour him, so bountiful has he been in his gifts to them; but they put him off with the worst, and think that good enough for him, so ungrateful are they in their returns to him. This was the fault of the people; but the priests connived at it, and indulged them in it. We find a distinction in the law, which allowed that to be offered for a freewill offering which should not be accepted for a vow, Lev. xxii. 23. But the priests would accept it though God would not, pretending to be more indulgent than he was, for which he will give them no thanks another day. 2nd. The character given of such worshippers. They are deceivers; they deal falsely and fraudulently with God; they play the hypocrite with him; they pretend to honour him in making the vow, but when it comes to be performed they put an affront upon him to that degree that it had been better not to have vowed than to vow and thus to pay. But let not such be themselves deceived, for God is not mocked; those that think to put a cheat upon God will prove in the end to have put a damning cheat upon their own souls. Hypocrites are deceivers, and they will prove self-deceivers, and so self-destroyers. 3rd. The doom passed upon them. They are cursed; they expect a blessing, but will meet with a curse, the tokens of God's wrath, according to the judgment written. 4th. The reason of this doom. "For I am a great King, saith the Lord of hosts," and therefore will reckon with those that deal with me but as a man like themselves; "my name is dreadful among the heathen," and therefore I will not bear that it should be contemptible among mine own people. The heathen paid more respect to their gods, though idols, than the Jews did to theirs, though the only true and living God. Note, The consideration of God's universal dominion, and the universal acknowledgment of it, should restrain us from all irreverence in his service.

CHAPTER II.

There are two great ordinances which Divine wisdom hath instituted, the wretched profanation of both which is complained of and sharply reproved in this chapter: I. The ordinance of the ministry, which is peculiar to the church, and is designed for the maintaining and keeping up of that; this was profaned by those that were themselves dignified with the honour of it, and intrusted with the business of it. The priests profaned the holy things of God; this they are here charged with, their sin is aggravated, and they are severely threatened for it, ver. 1—9. II. The ordinance of marriage, which is common to the world of mankind, and was instituted for the maintaining and keeping up of that; this was profaned both by the priests and by the people, in marrying strangers, ver. 10—12; treating their wives unkindly, ver. 13; putting them away, ver. 16; and herein dealing treacherously, ver. 10, 14, 15; and that which was at the bottom of this, and other instances of profaneness, was downright atheism, thinking God altogether such a one as themselves, which was in effect to say, There is no God, ver. 17. And these reproofs to them are warnings to us.

AND now, O ye priests, this commandment is for you.
2 If ye will not hear, and if ye will not lay it to heart,
To give glory unto my name, saith the LORD of hosts,
I will even send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings:
Yea, I have cursed them already, because ye do not lay it to heart.
3 Behold, I will corrupt your seed,
And spread dung upon your faces,
Even the dung of your solemn feasts;
And one shall take you away with it.
4 And ye shall know that I have sent this commandment unto you,
That my covenant might be with Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.
5 My covenant was with him of life and peace;
And I gave them to him
For the fear wherewith he feared me,
And was afraid before my name.
6 The law of truth was in his mouth,
And iniquity was not found in his lips:
He walked with me in peace and equity,
And did turn many away from iniquity.
7 For the priest's lips should keep knowledge,
And they should seek the law at his mouth:
For he is the messenger of the LORD of hosts.
8 But ye are departed out of the way;
Ye have caused many to stumble at the law;
Ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.
9 Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people,
According as ye have not kept my ways,
But have been partial in the law.

What was said in the foregoing chapter was directed to the priests; ch. i. 6, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts to you, O priests, that despise my name;" but the crimes here charged upon them they were guilty of as sacrificers, and for those they might think it some excuse that they offered what the people brought, and if they were not so good as they should be it was not their fault, but the people's; and therefore here the corruptions there complained of are traced to the source and spring of them, the faults the priests were guilty of as teachers of the people, as expositors of the law and the lively oracles. And this is a part of their office which still remains in the hands of gospel ministers, who are appointed to be pastors and teachers like the priests under the law, though not sacrificers like them; and therefore by them the admonition here is to be particularly regarded. If the priests had given the people better instructions, the people would have brought better offerings, and therefore the blame returns upon the priests; "And now, O ye priests, this commandment is" purely "for you," ver. 1, who should have taught the people the good knowledge of the Lord, and how to worship him aright. Note, The governors of the churches are under God's government, and to him they are accountable. Even for them that command God hath commandments. Nay, ver. 4, "Ye shall know that I have sent these commandments for you;" shall know it either, 1. By the power of the Spirit working with the word for their conviction and reformation; you shall know its original by its efficacy, whence it comes by what it doth. When the word of God to us brings about, and carries on, the work of God in us, then we cannot but know that he sent it to us, that it is not the word of Malachi, God's messenger, but it is indeed the word of God, and is sent not only in general to all, but in particular to us. Or, 2. By the accomplishment of the threatenings denounced against them; "Ye shall know" to your cost "that I have sent this commandment to you," for it shall not return void. Let us now see what this commandment is that is for the priests, which they must know was sent to them, and put into method the particulars of the charge.

First. Here is a recital of the covenant God made with that sacred tribe, which was their commission for their work and the patent of their honour. The Lord of hosts sent a commandment to them, for the establishing of this covenant, ver. 4, for his covenant is said to be the word which he commanded, Ps. cv. 8. And he sent this commandment by the prophet at this time for the re-establishing of it, that it might not be cut off for their persisting in the violation of it. Let the sons of Levi know then (and particularly the sons of Aaron) what honour God put upon their family, and what a trust he reposed in them; ver. 5, "My covenant was with him of life and peace." Besides the covenant of peculiarity made with all the house of Israel, there was a covenant of priesthood made with one family that they should do the services, and upon condition of that, should enjoy all the privileges, of the priest's office; that as Israel was a peculiar nation, a kingdom of priests, so the house of Aaron should be a family of priests set apart for the service and honour of God, to bear up his name in that nation as they were to bear up his name among the nations; both the one and the other in different degrees were to give glory unto God's name, ver. 2. God covenanted with them as his menial servants, obliged them to do his work, and promised to own and accept them in it. This is called his covenant of life and peace, because it was intended for the support of religion, which brings life and peace to the souls of men,—life to the dead, peace to the distressed; or because life and peace were by this covenant promised to those priests that faithfully and conscientiously discharged their duty; they shall have peace, which speaks security from all evil, and life, which speaks the summary of all good. What is here said of the covenant of priesthood is true of the covenant of grace made with all believers as spiritual priests; it is a covenant of life and peace; it assures all believers of life and peace, everlasting peace, everlasting life, of all happiness, both in this world and in that to come. This covenant was made with the whole tribe of Levi when they were distinguished from the rest of the tribes,—were not numbered with them, but were taken from among them, and "appointed over the tabernacle of testimony," Num. i. 49, 50; by virtue of which appointment God saith, Num. iii. 12, "The Levites shall be mine." It was made with Aaron when he and his sons were taken to "minister unto the Lord in the priest's office," Ex. xxviii. 1. Aaron is therefore called the saint of the Lord, Ps. cvi. 16. It was made with Phinehas and his family, a branch of Aaron's, upon a particular occasion, Num. xxv. 12, 13. And there the covenant of priesthood is called as here the covenant of peace, because by it peace was made and kept between God and Israel. These great blessings of life and peace contained in that covenant, God gave to him, to Levi, to Aaron, and to Phinehas; promised life and peace to them and their posterity, intrusted them with these benefits for the use and behoof of God's Israel; they received that they might give, as Christ himself did, Ps. lxviii. 18. Now, for the farther opening of this covenant, observe,

1. The considerations upon which it was grounded. It was "for the fear wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name." The tribe of Levi gave a signal proof of their holy fear of God, and their reverence for his name, when they appeared so bravely against the worshippers of the golden calf, Ex. xxxii. 26; and for their zeal in that matter God bestowed this blessing upon them, and invited them to consecrate themselves unto him. Phinehas also shewed himself zealous in the fear of God and his judgments, when, to stay the plague, he stabbed Zimri and Cozbi, Ps. cvi. 30, 31. Note, Those, and those only, that fear God's name can expect the benefit of the covenant of life and peace; and those who give proofs of their zeal for God it shall without fail be recompensed to them, in the glorious privileges of the Christian priesthood. Some read this, not as the consideration of the grant, but as the condition of it, "I gave them to him," provided that he should fear before me. If God grants us life and peace he expects we should fear before him.

2. The trust that was lodged in the priests by this covenant, ver. 7. They were hereby made the messengers of the Lord of hosts, messengers of that covenant of life and peace; not mediators of it, but only messengers, or ambassadors, employed to treat of the terms of peace between God and Israel. They were God's mouth to his people, from whom they must receive instructions according to the lively oracles. This was the office to which Levi was advanced; because, in his zeal for God, he did not acknowledge his brethren, nor know his own children, therefore "they shall teach Jacob God's judgments." Deu. xxxiii. 9, 10. Note, It is an honour to God's servants to be employed as his messengers, and to be sent on his errands. Angels have their name from thence; Haggai was called the Lord's messenger. This being their office, observe, not keep it from his people, but keep it for them. Ministers must be men of knowledge; for how are they able to teach others the things of God who are themselves unacquainted with those things or unready in them? They must keep knowledge, must furnish themselves with it, and retain what they have got, that they may be like the good householder, that "brings out of his treasury things new and old." Not only their heads, but their lips, must keep knowledge; they must not only have it, but they must have it ready, must have it at hand,—must have it, as we say, at their tongues' end,—to be communicated to others as there is occasion. Thus we read of wisdom in "the lips of him that hath understanding," with which they feed many, Pr. x. 13, 21.

2nd. What is the duty of the people. They should seek the law at his mouth; should consult the priest as God's messenger, and not only hear the message, but ask questions upon it, that they may the better understand it, and mistakes concerning it may be prevented and rectified. We are all concerned fully to know what the will of the Lord is, to know it distinctly and certainly, should be desirous to know it, and therefore inquisitive concerning it; "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" must not only consult the written word, "to the law and to the testimony," but must have recourse to God's messengers, and desire instruction and advice from them in the affairs of our souls, as we do from physicians and lawyers concerning our bodies and estates. Not but that ministers ought to lay down the law of God to those who do not inquire concerning it, or desire the knowledge of it,—they must "instruct them that oppose themselves," 2 Tim. ii. 25, as well as those that offer themselves; but it is people's duty to apply themselves to them for instruction, not only to hear, but to ask questions. Watchman, what of the night? thus, "if ye will inquire, inquire ye:" see Isa. xxi. 8, 11, 12. People should not only seek comfort at the mouth of their ministers, but seek the law there; for if we be found in the way of duty we shall find it the way of comfort.

Secondly. Here is a memorial of the fidelity and zeal of many of their predecessors in the priest's office, which is mentioned as an aggravation of their sin in degenerating from such honourable ancestors, and deserting such illustrious examples; and as a justification of God in withdrawing from them those tokens of his presence which he had granted to them that kept close to him. See here, ver. 6, how good the godly priest was whose steps they should have trod in, and what good he did, God's grace working with him.

1. See how good he was. He was ready and mighty in the Scriptures; "The law of truth was in his mouth" for the use of those that asked the law at his mouth; and in all his discourses there appeared more or less of the law of truth. Every thing he said was under the government of that law, and with it he governed others. He spake as one having authority, every word was a law, and as one that had both wisdom and integrity; it was a law of truth, and truth is a law, it has a commanding power,—it is by truth that Christ rules. "The law of truth was in his mouth," for his resolutions of cases of conscience proposed to him were such as might be depended upon; his opinion was good law. "Iniquity was not found in his lips;" he did not "handle the word of God deceitfully" to please men, to serve a turn, or make an interest for himself, but told all that consulted him what the law was, whether it were pleasing or displeasing. He did not pronounce that unclean which was clean, nor that clean which was unclean, as one of the rabbins expounds it; and his conversation was of a piece with this doctrine. God himself gives him this honourable testimony, "He walked with me in peace and equity;" he did not think it enough to talk of God, but he walked with him. The temper of his mind and the tenor of his life were of a piece with his doctrine and profession; he lived a life of communion with God, and made it his constant care and business to please him; he lived like a priest that was chosen to walk before God, 1 Sam. ii. 30. His conversation was quiet, he was meek and gentle towards all men, was a pattern and promoter of love; he walked with God in peace, was himself peaceable, and a great peacemaker; and it was honest, he did no wrong to any, but made conscience of rendering to all their due; He walked with me in equity, or rectitude. We must not for peace sake transgress the rules of equity, but must keep the peace as far as is consistent with justice; the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable. Ministers, of all men, are concerned to walk with God in peace and equity, that they may be examples to the flock.

2. See what good he did. He answered the ends of his advancement to that office; "He did turn many away from iniquity." He made it his business to do good, and God crowned his endeavours with wonderful success; he helped to save many a soul from death, and there are multitudes now in heaven blessing God that ever they knew him. Ministers must lay out themselves to the utmost for the conversion of sinners, and even among those that have the name of Israelites there is need of conversion work; there are many to be turned from iniquity; and they must reckon it an honour, and a rich reward of their labour, if they may but be instrumental herein. It is God only that by his grace can turn men from iniquity, and yet it is here said of a pious, laborious minister, that he turned men from iniquity, as a worker together with God, and an instrument in his hand; and they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars, Dan. xii. 3. Note, Those ministers, and those only, are likely to turn men from iniquity that preach sound doctrine and live good lives, and both according to the Scripture; for, as one of the rabbins observes here, when the priest is upright many will be upright.

Thirdly. Here is a high charge drawn up against the priests of the present age, who violated the covenant of the priesthood, and went directly contrary both to the rules and to the examples that were set before them. Many particulars of their sins we had in the chapters before, and we find, Neh. xiii., that there were many corruptions crept into the church of the Jews at this time,—mixed marriages, admitting strangers into the house of God, profanation of the sabbath-day, which were all owing to the carelessness and unfaithfulness of the priests; here it is charged upon them in general,

1. That they transgressed the rule. "Ye are departed out of the way," ver. 8; out of the good way which God hath prescribed to you, and which your godly ancestors walked before you in. It is ill with a people when those whose office it is to guide them in the way do themselves depart out of it. "Ye have not kept my ways," not kept in them yourselves, nor done your part to keep others in them, ver. 9.

2. That they betrayed their trust. "Ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi," have violated it, have contradicted the great intentions of it, and have done what in you lay to frustrate and defeat them; you have managed your office as if it were designed only to feed you fat, and make you great, and not for the glory of God and the good of the souls of men. This was a corrupting of the covenant of Levi; it was perverting the ends of the office, and making it truckle to those sensual, secular things, over which it ought always to have dominion. And thus they forfeited the benefit of that covenant, and corrupted it to themselves; they made it void, and lost that life and peace which was by it settled upon them. We have no reason to expect God should perform his part of the covenant if we do not make conscience of performing ours. Another instance of their betraying their trust was, that they were "partial in the law," ver. 9. In the law given to them they would pick and choose their duty,—this they would do, and that they would not do, just as they pleased, which is the fashion of hypocrites; while those whose hearts are upright with God have a respect to all his commandments. Or, rather, in the law they were to lay down to the people. In this they knew faces, so the word is; they accepted persons; they wilfully misinterpreted and misapplied the law, either to cross those they had a spleen to or countenance those they had a kindness for; would wink at those sins in some which in others they would be sharp upon, according as their interest or inclination led them. God is no respecter of persons in making his law, nor will he in reckoning for the breach of it; he regardeth not the rich more than the poor, and therefore his priests, his ministers, misrepresent him, and do him a great deal of dishonour, if in doctrine or discipline they be respecters of persons: see 1 Tim. v. 21.

3. That they did a great deal of mischief to the souls of men, which they should have helped to save. "Ye have caused many to stumble at the law;" not only to fall in the law, as the margin reads it, by transgressing it, taught and encouraged to do so by the examples of the priests, but to stumble at the law by contracting prejudices against it, as if the law were the minister of sin, and gave countenance to it. Thus Hophni and Phinehas by their wickedness "made the sacrifices of the Lord to be abhorred," 1 Sam. ii. 17. There are many to whom the law of God is a stumblingblock, the Gospel of Christ a "savour of death unto death," and Christ himself a rock of offence; and nothing contributes more to this than the vicious lives of those that make a profession of religion, by which men are tempted to say it is all a jest. This is properly a scandal, a stone of stumbling; there is no good reason it should be so to any, but "Woe to those to whom this offence comes."

4. That when they were under the rebukes both of the word and of the providence of God for it, they would not hear, that is, they would not heed, they "would not lay it to heart;" they were not at all grieved or shamed for their sin, nor affected with the tokens of God's displeasure they were under. What we hear doth us no good unless we lay it to heart, and admit the impressions of it. "Ye will not lay it to heart" to "give glory unto my name," by repentance and reformation. Therefore we should lay to heart the things of God, that we may give glory to the name of God, may praise him in and for all that whereby he hath made himself known. It is bad in any to rob God of his honour, but worst in ministers, whose office and business it is to bear up his name, and to give him the glory due to it.

Fourthly. Here is a record of the judgments God had brought upon these priests for their profaneness, and their profanation of holy things.

1. They had lost their comfort; ver. 2, "I have already cursed your blessings." They had not the comfort of their work, which is the satisfaction of doing good; for the blessings with which they, as priests, blessed the people, God was so far from saying Amen to, that he turned them into curses, as he did Balaam's curses into blessings, that profane people should not have the favour of receiving God's blessings, nor those profane priests the honour of conferring and conveying them, but both should lie under the tokens of his wrath. Nor had they the comfort of their wages; for the blessings with which God blessed them were turned into a curse to them, by their abuse of them; they could not receive them as the gifts of his favour, when they had made themselves so obnoxious to his displeasure by not laying to heart the reproofs given them.

2. They had lost their credit; ver. 9, "Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people." While they glorified God he dignified them, and supported their reputation. And a great interest they had in the love and esteem of the people. While they did their duty, and walked with God in peace and equity, every one had a value and veneration for them, they were truly styled the reverend the priests: but when they forsook the ways of God, and corrupted the covenant of Levi, they thereby made themselves not only mean, but vile, in the eyes even of the common people, who, the more they honoured the order, the more they hated the men that were a dishonour to it. Their carriage, their misconduct, had a direct tendency to this, and God owns his hand in it, and will have it looked upon as a just judgment of his upon them, and not only produced by their sin, but answering to it; they put dishonour upon God, and made "his table and the fruit thereof contemptible," ch. i. 12, and therefore God justly put dishonour upon them, and made them contemptible; they exposed themselves, and therefore God exposed them. Note, Sin, as it is a reproach to any people, so especially to priests. There is not a more despicable animal upon the face of the earth than a profane, wicked, scandalous minister.

Fifthly. Here is a sentence of wrath passed upon them, and this the prophet begins with, ver. 2, 3. But it is conditional: "If ye will not lay it to heart;" implying, if you will, God's anger shall be turned away, and all shall be well; but, if you persist in these wicked courses, hear your doom,—your sin will be your ruin.

1. They shall fall and lie under the curse of God; "I will send a curse upon you." The wrath of God shall be revealed against them, according to the threatenings of the written word. Note, They who violate the commands of the law lay themselves under the curses of the law.

2. Neither their employments nor their enjoyments as priests shall be clean to them; "I will curse your blessings," so that you shall neither be blessed yourselves, nor blessings to the people, but even your plenty shall be plagues to you, and ye shall be plagues to your generation.

3. The fruits of the earth, which they had the tithe of, should be no comfort to them. "Behold I will corrupt your seed." The corn you sow shall rot under ground, and never come up again; the consequence of which must needs be famine and scarcity of provisions, so that no meat offerings shall be brought to the altar, which the priests will soon have a loss of. Or it may be understood of the seed of the word which they preached. God threatens to deny his blessing with the instructions they gave the people, so that their labour shall be lost, as that of the husbandman is when the seed is corrupt; and so it agrees with that threatening, Jer. xxiii. 32, "They shall not profit this people at all."

4. They and their services shall be rejected of God. He will be so far from taking any pleasure in them that he will loathe and detest them; "I will spread dung in your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts," that is, of the sacrifices that were offered at those feasts. Instead of being himself pleased with the fat of their sacrifices, he will shew himself displeased, by throwing the dung of them in their faces, which he doth, in effect, when he saith, Bring no more vain oblations, your incense is an abomination to me. Note, Those that rest in their external performances of religion, which they should count but dung that they may win Christ, shall not only come short of acceptance with God in them, but shall be filled with shame and confusion for their folly.

5. All will end at last in their utter ruin; "One shall take you away with it." They shall be so overspread with the dung of their sacrifices that they shall be carried away with it to the dunghill, as a part of it. Any one shall serve to take you away, the common scavenger. Reprobate silver shall men call them, and treat them accordingly, because the Lord has rejected them.

Corrupt practices are the genuine fruit and product of corrupt principles; and the badness of men's hearts and lives is owing to some loose, atheistical notions which they have got, and govern themselves by. Now in these verses we have an instance of this; we here find men dealing falsely with one another, and it is because they think falsely of their God. Observe,

First. How corrupt their practices were. In general they dealt treacherously "every man against his brother," ver. 10. It cannot be expected that he who is false to his God should be true to his friend. They had dealt treacherously with God in his tithes and offerings, and had defrauded him, and thus conscience was debauched, its bonds and cords broken, and a door opened to all manner of injustice and dishonesty, and the bonds of relation and natural affection are broken through likewise, and no difficulty made of it. Some think the treacherous dealings here reproved are the same with those instances of oppression and extortion which we find complained of to Nehemiah about this time, Neh. v. 3—7. Therein they forgot the God of their fathers, and the covenant of their fathers, and rendered their offerings unacceptable, Isa. i. 11. But it seems rather to refer to what was amiss in their marriages, which was likewise complained of, Neh. xiii. 23.

Two things they are charged with as very provoking to God in this matter, —taking strange wives of heathen nations, and abusing and putting away the wives they had of their own nation; and in both these they dealt treacherously, and violated a sacred covenant: the former was in contempt of the covenant of peculiarity, the latter of the marriage covenant.

1. In contempt of the covenant of God made with Israel as a peculiar people to himself, they married strange wives, which was expressly prohibited, and provided against, in that covenant, Deu. vii. 3. Observe here,

1st. What good reason they had to deal faithfully with God and one another in this covenant, and not to make marriages with the heathen. First. They were expressly bound up from such marriages by covenant. God engaged to do them good upon this condition, that they should not mingle themselves with the heathen. This was the covenant of their fathers, the covenant made with their fathers, noting the antiquity and authority of it; and its being the great charter by which that nation was incorporated, they lay under all possible obligations to observe it strictly, and yet they profaned it, as if they were not bound by it. They profane the covenant of their fathers who live in disobedience to the command of the God of their fathers. Secondly. They were a peculiar people, united in one body, and therefore ought to have united for the preserving of the honour of their peculiarity. "Have we not all one Father?" Yes, we have; for "has not one God created us?" Are we not all his offspring? Are we not made of one blood? Yes, certainly we are. God is a common Father to all mankind, and, upon that account, all we are brethren, members one of another, and therefore ought to put away lying, Eph. iv. 25, and not to deal treacherously, no, not any man against his brother. But here it seems to refer to the Jewish nation; "Have we not all one Father," Abraham, or Jacob? This they prided themselves in, "We have Abraham to our father." But here it is turned upon them as an aggravation of their sin, in betraying the honour of their nation by marrying with heathens; "Hath not one God created us?" that is, formed us into a people, made us a nation by ourselves, and put a life into us distinct from that of other nations. And should not this oblige us to maintain the dignity of our character? Note, The consideration of the unity of the church in Christ, its Founder and Father, should engage us carefully to preserve the purity of the church, and to guard against all corruptions. Thirdly. They were dedicated to God, as well as distinguished from the neighbour nations. "Israel was holiness to the Lord," Jer. ii. 3, taken into covenant with him, set apart by him for himself, to be to him for a name and a praise, and upon this account he loved them, and delighted in them. The sanctuary set up among them was the "holiness of the Lord, which he loved," of which he said, It is "my rest for ever, here will I dwell, for I have desired it;" but by their marrying strange wives they profaned this holiness, and laid the honour of it in the dust. Note, Those that are devoted to God, and beloved of him, are concerned to preserve their integrity, that they may not throw themselves out of his love, nor lose the honour, or defeat the end, of their dedication to him.

2nd. How treacherously they dealt notwithstanding. They profaned themselves in that very thing which was prescribed to them for the preserving of the honour of their singularity. Judah has "married the daughter of a strange god." The harm was not so much that she was the daughter of a strange nation, (God has made all nations of men, and is himself king of nations,) but that she is the daughter of a strange god, trained up in the service and worship of false gods, and at their disposal, as a daughter at her father's disposal, and having a dependence upon them; hence some of the rabbins (quoted by Dr. Pocock) say, 'He that marries a heathen woman is as if he made himself son-in-law to an idol.' It began the corruption of the old world, that the sons of God married the daughters of men, Gen. vi. 2. It is the same thing that is here complained of, but, as it is expressed, it sounds worse,—the sons of God married the daughters of a strange god. Herein Judah is said to have dealt treacherously, for they basely betrayed their own honour, and profaned that holiness of the Lord which they should have loved, so some read it; and it is said to be "an abomination committed in Israel and in Jerusalem;" it was hateful to God, and very unbecoming those that were called by his name. Note, It is an abominable thing for those that profess the holiness of the Lord to profane it, particularly by yoking themselves unequally with unbelievers.

3rd. How severely God would reckon with them for it; ver. 12, "The Lord will cut off the man that doth this," that marries the daughter of a strange god. He has in effect cut himself off from the holy nation, and joined in with foreigners and aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, and so shall his doom be; "God will cut him off, him and all that belong to him," so the original intimates. He shall be cut off from Israel and from Jerusalem, and not be written among the living there. The Lord will cut off both "the master and the scholar" that are guilty of this sin; both the teachers and the taught, the blind leaders and the blind followers, shall fall together into the ditch; both him that wakeneth and him that answereth, (so it is in the margin,) for the master calls up his scholar to his business, and stirs him up in it. They shall be cut off together "out of the tabernacles of Jacob," God will no more own them as belonging to his nation. Nay, and the priest that "offereth an offering to the Lord," if he marry a strange wife (as we find many of the priests did, Ezr. x. 18,) he shall not escape; the offering he offers shall not atone for him, but he shall be cut off from the temple of the Lord, as others from the tabernacles of Jacob. Nehemiah chased away from him and from the priesthood one of the sons of the high priest whom he found guilty of this sin, Neh. xiii. 28.

2. In contempt of the marriage covenant, which God instituted for the common benefit of mankind, they abused and put away the wives they had of their own nation, probably to make room for those strange wives, when it was all the fashion to marry such; ver. 13, "This also have ye done." This is the second article of the charge, for the way of sin is down-hill, and one violation of the covenant is an inlet to another.

1st. Let us see what it is that is here complained of. They did not carry it as they ought to do towards their wives. First. They were cross with them, froward and peevish, and made their lives bitter to them; so that when they came with their wives and families to worship God at the solemn feasts, which they should have done with rejoicing, they were all out of humour; the poor wives were ready to break their hearts, and, not daring to make their case known to any other, they complained to God, and "covered the altar of the Lord with tears, with weeping and with crying." This is illustrated by the instance of Hannah, who, upon account of her husband having another wife, (though otherwise a kind husband,) and the discontent thence arising, whenever they went up to the house of the Lord to worship fretted and wept, and was in bitterness of soul, and would not eat, 1 Sam. i. 6, 7, 10; so it was with these wives here. This was so contrary to that cheerfulness which God requires in his worshippers, that it spoiled the acceptableness of their devotions; God "regardeth not their offering any more." See what a good Master they serve, who will not have his altar covered with tears, but compassed with songs; which condemns those that left his worship for that of idols, among the rites of which we find "women weeping for Tammuz," Eze. viii. 14, and the blood of the worshippers gushing out upon the altar, 1 Kin. xviii. 28. See also what an ill thing it is to put others out of frame for the cheerful worship of God. Though it is their fault by their fretfulness to indispose themselves for their duty, yet it is much more their fault that "provoked them to make them to fret." It is a reason given why yoke-fellows should live in holy love and joy, "that their prayers may not be hindered," 1 Pet. iii. 7. Secondly. They dealt treacherously with them, ver. 14—16. They did not perform their promises to them, but defrauded them of their maintenance or dower, or took in concubines to share in the affection that was due to their wives only. Thirdly. They put them away, gave them a bill of divorce, and turned them off. Nay, perhaps they did it without the ceremony that the law of Moses prescribed, ver. 16. Fourthly. In all this they covered violence with their garment. They abused their wives, and were vexatious to them; and yet, in the sight of others, they pretended to be very loving to them, and tender of them, and to cast a skirt over them. It is common for those that do violence to advance some specious pretence or other wherewith to cover it as with a garment.

2nd. Let us see the proof and aggravations of the charge. First. It is sufficiently proved by the testimony of God himself; "The Lord has been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth," ver. 14; has been witness to the marriage covenant between thee and her, for to him you appealed concerning your sincerity in it, and fidelity to it; he has been a witness to all the violations of it, and all thy treacherous dealings in contempt of it, and is ready to judge between thee and her. Note, This should engage us to be faithful both to God and to all with whom we have to do, that God himself is a witness both to all our covenants and to all our covenant breaches; and he is a witness against whom there lies no exception. Secondly. It is highly aggravated by the consideration of the person wronged and abused. 1*st.* She is thy wife, thy own, bone of thy bone, and flesh of thy flesh; the nearest to thee of all the relations thou hast in the world, and to cleave to whom thou must quit the rest. 2*nd.* She is "the wife of thy youth;" that is, who had thy affections when they were at the strongest, was thy first choice, and with whom thou hast lived long. Let not the darling of thy youth be the scorn and loathing of thine age. 3*rd.* She is thy companion; she has long been an equal sharer with thee in thy cares, and griefs, and joys. The wife is to be looked upon not as a servant, but as a companion to the husband, with whom he should freely converse and take sweet counsel as with a friend, and in whose company he should take delight more than in any other's, for is she not appointed to be thy companion? 4th. She is "the wife of thy covenant," to whom thou art so firmly bound that while she continues faithful thou canst not be loosed from her, for it was a covenant for life. It is the wife with whom thou hast covenanted, and who has covenanted with thee; there is an oath of God between you, which is not to be trifled with, is not to be played fast and loose with. Married people should often call to mind their marriage vows, and review them with all seriousness, as those that make conscience of performing what they promised.

3rd. Let us see the reasons given why man and wife should continue together to their lives' end in holy love and peace, and neither quarrel with each other nor part from each other. First. Because God has joined them together; ver. 15, "Did not he make one?" One Eve for one Adam, that Adam might never "take another to vex her," Lev. xviii. 18, nor put her away to make room for another. It is great wickedness to complain of the law of marriage as a confinement, when Adam, in innocency, in honour, in Eden, in the garden of pleasure, was confined to one. Yet God had "the residue of the Spirit," he could have made another Eve as amiable as that he did make, but designing "Adam a help meet for him," he made him one wife; had he made him more he had not had a meet help. And wherefore did he make but one woman for one man? It was that he might seek a godly seed, a seed of God, so the word is, a seed that should bear the image of God, be employed in the service of God, and be devoted to his glory and honour; that every man having his own wife, and but one, according to the law, 1 Cor. vii. 2, they might live in chaste and holy love, under the directions and restraints of the Divine law, and not as brute beasts, under the dominion of lust, and thus might propagate the nature of man in such a way as might make it most likely to participate in a Divine nature; that the children being born in holy matrimony, which is an ordinance of God, and by which the inclinations of nature are kept under the regulations of God's command, might thus be made a seed to serve him, and be bred as they are born under his direction and dominion. Note, The raising up of a godly seed, which shall be "accounted to the Lord for a generation," is one great end of the institution of marriage, but that is a good reason why the marriage bed should be kept undefiled, and the marriage bond inviolable. Husbands and wives must therefore live in the fear of God, that their seed may be a godly seed, else were they unclean, but now are they holy, as children of the covenant, the marriage covenant, which was a type of the covenant of grace, and the conjugal union, when thus preserved entire, of the mystical union between Christ and his church, in which he seeks and secures to himself a godly seed: see Eph. v. 25, 32. Secondly. Because he is much displeased with those who go about to put asunder what he has joined together; ver. 16, "The God of Israel saith that he hateth putting away." He had indeed permitted it to the Jews for the hardness of their hearts, or, rather, limited and clogged it, Mat. xix. 8; but he hated it, especially as they practised it who "put away their wives for every cause," Mat. xix. 3. Let those wives that elope from their husbands, and put themselves away, those husbands that are cruel to their wives and turn them away, or take their affections off their wives and place them upon others, yea, and those husbands and wives that live asunder by consent for want of love to each other, let such as these know that the God of Israel hates such practices, however vain men may make a jest of them.

4th. Let us see the caution inferred from all this. We have it twice; ver. 15, "Therefore take heed to your spirit, and let none deal treacherously against the wife of his youth;" and again, ver. 16. Note, They that would be kept from sin must take heed to their spirits, for there all sin begins; they must keep their hearts with all diligence, must keep a jealous eye upon them, and a strict hand, and must watch against the first risings of sin there. We shall act as we are spirited, and therefore, that we may regulate our actions, we must consider what manner of spirit we are of; we must take heed to our spirits with reference to our particular relations, and see that we stand rightly affected to them, and be of good temper, for otherwise we shall be in danger of dealing treacherously. If our own hearts deal treacherously with us, whom will they not deal treacherously with?

Secondly. Observe how corrupt their principles were, to which was owing all these corrupt practices. Let us run up the streams to the fountain; ver. 17, "Ye have wearied the Lord with your words." They thought to evade the convictions of the word, and to justify themselves by cavilling with God's proceedings, but their defence was their offence, and their vindication of themselves was the aggravation of their crime; they affronted the Lord with their words, and repeated them so often, and persisted so long in their contradictions, that they even wearied him, see Isa. vii. 13; they made him weary of doing them good as he had done, and stopped the current of his favours; or, they represented him as weary of governing the world, and willing to quit it, and lay aside the care of it. Note, It is a wearisome thing, even to God himself, to hear people insist upon their own justification in their corrupt and wicked practices, and to plead their atheistical principles in vindication of them. But, as if God by his prophet had done them wrong, see how impudently they ask, "Wherein have we wearied him?" What are those vexatious words whereby we have wearied him? Note, Sinful words are more offensive to the God of heaven than they are commonly thought to be. But God has his proofs ready; two things they had said, at least in their hearts, and thoughts are words to God, with which they had wearied him:

1. They had denied him to be a holy God, and had asserted that concerning him which is directly contrary to the doctrine of his holiness. As he is a holy God he hates sin, is of purer eyes than to behold it, and "cannot endure to look upon it," Hab. i. 13; he "is not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness," Ps. v. 4; and yet they had the impudence to say, in direct contradiction to this, "every one that doth evil is good in the sight of the Lord, and he delighteth in them." This wicked inference they drew without any reason from the prosperity of sinners in their sinful courses, (see ch. iii. 15,) as if God's love or hatred were to be known by that which is before us, and those must be concluded "good in the sight of the Lord" that are rich in the world. Or, this they said because they wished it might be so; they were resolved to do evil, and yet to think themselves "good in the sight of the Lord," and to believe that he delighted in them notwithstanding; and therefore, under pretence of making God not so severe as he was commonly represented, they said as they would have it, and thought he was altogether such an one as themselves. Note, Those who think God a friend to sin affront him and deceive themselves.

2. They had denied him to be the righteous governor of the world. If he did not delight in sin and sinners, yet it would serve their turn to believe that he would never punish it or them. They said, "Where is the God of judgment?" that God that we have been so often told would call us to an account, and reckon with us for what we have said or done; where is he? He hath forsaken the earth, and takes no notice of what is said and done there; he hath said he will come to judgment, but where is the promise of his coming? We may do what we please, he sees us not, nor will regard us. It is such a challenge to the Judge of the whole earth as bids defiance to his justice, and in effect dares him to do his worst. Such scoffers as these there were in the latter days of the Jewish church, and such there shall be in the latter days of the Christian church; but their unbelief shall not make the promise of God of none effect, for the day of the Lord will come; behold the Judge standeth before the door, the God of judgment is at hand.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter we have, I. A promise of the coming of the Messiah and of his forerunner, and the errand he comes upon is here particularly described, both the comfort which his coming brings to his church and people and the terror it will bring to the wicked, ver. 1—6. II. A reproof of the Jews for their corrupting of God's ordinances, and sacrilegious robbing him of his dues; with a charge to them to amend this matter, and a promise that if they did God would return in mercy to them, ver. 7—12. III. A description of the wickedness of the wicked that speak against God, ver. 13—15; and of the righteousness of the righteous that speak for him, with the precious promises made to them, ver. 16—18.

BEHOLD, I will send my messenger,
And he shall prepare the way before me:
And the Lord, whom ye seek,
Shall suddenly come to his temple,
Even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in:
Behold, he shall come, saith the LORD of hosts.
2 But who may abide the day of his coming?
And who shall stand when he appeareth?
For he is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' sope:
3 And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver:
And he shall purify the sons of Levi,
And purge them as gold and silver, [eousness.
That they may offer unto the LORD an offering in right-

EGYPTIAN CRUCIBLES.

4 Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the LORD,
As in the days of old,
And as in former years.
5 And I will come near to you to judgment;
And I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers,
And against the adulterers, and against false swearers,
And against those that oppress the hireling in his wages,
The widow, and the fatherless.
And that turn aside the stranger from his right,
And fear not me, saith the LORD of hosts.
6 For I am the LORD, I change not:
Therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.

The first words of this chapter seem a direct answer to the profane atheistical demand of the scoffers of those days, which closed the foregoing chapter: "Where is the God of judgment?" To which it is readily answered, Here he is, he is just at the door, the long-expected Messiah is ready to appear; and he saith, "For judgment am I come into the world," for that judgment which you so impudently bid defiance to. One of the rabbins saith the meaning of this is, that God will raise up a righteous King to set things in order, even the king Messiah. And the beginning of the Gospel of Christ is expressly said to be the accomplishment of this promise with which the Old Testament concludes, Mar. i. 1, 2; so that by this the two Testaments are, as it were, tacked together, and made to answer one another. Now here we have,

First. A prophecy of the appearing of his forerunner, John the Baptist, which the prophet Isaiah had foretold, Isa. xl. 3, as the preparing of the way of the Lord, to which this here seems to have a reference, for the words of the latter prophets confirmed those of the former. Behold, "I will send my messenger," or, I do send him, or, I am sending him, I am determined to send him; he will now shortly come, and will not come unsent, though to a careless generation he comes unsent for. Observe,

1. He is God's messenger; that is his office. He is Malachi, so the word is, the same with the name of this prophet; he is my angel, my ambassador. John Baptist had his commission from heaven, and not of men. All held John Baptist for a prophet, for he was God's messenger, as the prophets were, and came on the same errand to the world that they were sent upon, to call men to repentance and reformation.

2. He is Christ's harbinger. He shall "prepare the way before me," by calling men to those duties which qualify them to receive the comforts of the Messiah and his coming; and by taking them off from a confidence in their relation to Abraham as their father, which they thought would serve their turn without a Saviour; and by giving notice that the Messiah was now at hand, and so raising men's expectations of him, and making them readily to go into the measures he would take for the setting up of his kingdom in the world. Note, God observes a method in his work, and before he comes takes care to have his way prepared. This is like the giving of a sign; the church was told long before that the Messiah would come, and here it is added that, by the same token, a little before he appears, there shall be a signal given; a great Prophet shall arise that shall give notice of his approach, and call to the everlasting gates and doors to lift up their heads, and give him admission. The accomplishment of this is a proof that Jesus is the Christ, is he that should come, and we are to look for no other; for there was such a messenger sent before him, who "made ready a people prepared for the Lord," Lu. i. 17. The Jewish writers run themselves into great absurdities to evade the conviction of this evidence; some of them say this messenger is the angel of death, who shall take the wicked out of this life to be sent into hell torments; others of them say it is Messiah the son of Joseph, who shall appear before Messiah the son of David; others, this prophet himself; others, an angel from heaven. Such mistakes do they run into that will not receive the truth.

Secondly. A prophecy of the appearing of the Messiah himself. "The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple," even the God of judgment, who ye think has forsaken the earth, and you wot not what is become of him. The Messiah has been long called he that should come, and you may assure yourselves that now shortly he will come.

1. He is the Lord—Adonai, the basis and foundation on which the world is founded and fastened, the ruler and governor of all; that one Lord over all, Acts x. 36, that hath all power committed to him, Mat. xxviii. 18, and is to reign over the house of Jacob for ever, Lu. i. 33.

2. He is the messenger of the covenant, or the angel of the covenant, that blessed one that was sent from heaven to negotiate a peace, and settle a correspondence between God and man. He is the angel, the archangel, the Lord of the angels, who received commission from the Father to bring man home to God by a covenant of grace, who had revolted from him by the violation of the covenant of innocency. Christ is the angel of this covenant, by whose mediation it is brought about and established, as God's covenant with Israel was made by the disposition of angels, Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19. Christ as a prophet is the messenger and mediator of the covenant, nay, he is given for a covenant, Isa. xlix. 8; that covenant which is all our salvation, "began to be spoken by the Lord," Heb. ii. 3. Though he is the prince of the covenant, as some read this here, yet he condescended to be the messenger of it, that we might have full assurance of God's goodwill towards man, upon his word.

3. He it is "whom ye seek, whom ye delight in;" whom the pious Jews expect and desire, and whose coming they think of with a great deal of pleasure. In looking and waiting for him, they looked for redemption in Jerusalem, and "waited for the consolation of Israel," Lu. ii. 25, 38. Christ was to be the desire of all nations, desirable to all, Hag. ii. 7; but he was the desire of the Jewish nation actually, because they had the promise of his coming made to them. Note, Those that seek Jesus shall find pleasure in him. If he be our heart's desire he will be our heart's delight; and we have reason to delight in him who is the messenger of the covenant, and to bid him welcome who came to us on so kind an errand.

4. He shall suddenly come; his coming draws nigh, and we see it not at so great a distance as the patriarchs saw it at. Or, he shall come immediately after the appearing of John Baptist, shall even tread on the heels of his forerunner; when that morning star appears, believe that the Sun of righteousness is not far off. Or, he shall come suddenly, that is, he shall come when by many he is not looked for; as his second coming will be, so his first coming was, at midnight, when some had done looking for him, for "shall he find faith on the earth?" Lu. xviii. 8. The Jews reckon the Messiah among the things that come unawares, so Dr. Pocock. And the coming of the Son of man in his day is said to be as the lightning, which is very surprising, Lu. xvii. 24.

5. He shall come to his temple; this temple at Jerusalem which was lately built, that latter house which he was to be the glory of. It is his temple, for it is his Father's house, Jno. ii. 16. Christ at forty days old was presented in the temple, and thither Simeon went by the Spirit, according to the direction of this prophecy, to see him, Lu. ii. 27. At twelve years old he was in the temple about his Father's business, Lu. ii. 49. When he rode in triumph into Jerusalem, it should seem he went directly to the temple, Mat. xxi. 12; and, ver. 14, thither the blind and the lame came to him to be healed; there he often preached, and often disputed, and often wrought miracles. By this it appears that the Messiah was to come while that temple was standing; that, therefore, being long since destroyed, we must conclude that he is come, and we are to look for no other. Note, Those that would be acquainted with Christ, and obtain his favour, must meet him in his temple, for there he records his name, and there he will bless his people. There we must receive his oracles, and there we must pay our homage.

6. The promise of his coming is repeated and ratified. "Behold he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts;" you may depend upon his word who cannot lie, he shall come, he will come, he will not tarry.

Thirdly. An account given of the great ends and intentions of his coming, ver. 2. He is one whom they seek, and one whom they delight in, and yet "who may abide in the day of his coming?" It is a thing to be thought of with great seriousness, and with a holy awe and reverence, for "who shall stand when he appeareth?" though he comes not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might have life. This may refer,

1. To the terrors of his appearance. Even in the days of his flesh there were some emanations of his glory and power, such as none could stand before, witness his transfiguration, and the prodigies that attended his death; and we read of divers that trembled before him, as Mar. v. 33.

2. To the troublous times that should follow soon after. The Jewish doctors speak of the pangs or griefs of the Messiah, meaning, they say, the great afflictions that should be to Israel at the time of his coming; he himself speaks of great tribulation then approaching, "such as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be," Mat. xxiv. 21.

3. To the trial which his coming would make of the children of men. He shall be "like a refiner's fire," which separates between the gold and the dross by melting the ore; or "like fullers' soap," which with much rubbing fetcheth the spots out of the cloth. Christ came to discover men, "that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed," Lu. ii. 35; to distinguish men, to separate between the precious and the vile, for "his fan is in his hand," Mat. iii. 12; to "send fire on the earth, not peace, but rather division," Lu. xii. 49, 51; to "shake heaven and earth," that the wicked might be shaken out, Job xxxviii. 13, and that the things which "cannot be shaken might remain," Heb. xii. 27. See what the effect of the trial will be that shall be made by the Gospel:

1st. The Gospel shall work good upon those that are disposed to be good. To them it shall be a savour of life unto life; ver. 3, "He shall sit as a refiner." Christ by his Gospel shall purify and reform his church, and by his Spirit working with it shall regenerate and cleanse particular souls; for to this end he gave himself for the church, "that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word," Eph. v. 26, and "purify to himself a particular people," Tit. ii. 14. Christ is the great refiner. Observe, First. Who they are that he will purify. The sons of Levi; that is, all those that are devoted to his praise, and employed in his service, as the tribe of Levi was, and whom he designs to make unto our God spiritual priests, Rev. i. 6; a holy priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Note, All true Christians are sons of Levi, set apart for God to do the service of his sanctuary, and to war the good warfare. Secondly. How he will purify them. He will purge them as gold and silver; that is, he will sanctify them inwardly, will not only wash away the spots they have contracted from without, but will take away the dross that is found in them; will separate from them their indwelling corruptions which rendered their faculties worthless and useless, and so make them like gold refined, both valuable and serviceable. "He will purge them" with fire "as gold and silver are purged," for "he baptizeth with the Holy Ghost and with fire," Mat. iii. 11; with the Holy Ghost working like fire. He will purge them by afflictions and manifold temptations, that the trial of their faith might be found to praise and honour, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. He will purge them so as to make them a precious people to himself. Thirdly. What will be the effect of it. "That they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness;" that is, that they may be in sincerity converted to God, and consecrated to his praise, (hence we read of the offering up or sacrificing of the Gentiles to God, when they were sanctified by the Holy Ghost, Rom. xv. 16,) and that they may in a spiritual manner worship God according to his will, may offer the sacrifices of righteousness, Ps. iv. 5, the offering of prayer, and praise, and holy love, that they may be the true worshippers who worship the Father in spirit and in truth, Jno. iv. 23, 24. Note, We cannot offer unto the Lord any right performances in religion unless our persons be justified and sanctified. Till we ourselves be refined and purified by the grace of God we cannot do any thing that will redound to the glory of God; God had respect to Abel first, and then to his offering; and therefore God purgeth his people that they may offer their offerings to him in righteousness, Zep. iii. 9. He therefore makes the tree good, that the fruit may be good. And then it follows, ver. 4, "The offering of Judah and Jerusalem shall be pleasant unto the Lord." It shall no longer be offensive, as it has been, when in the former days they worshipped other gods with the God of Israel, or when in the present days they brought the torn, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice; but it shall be acceptable, he will be pleased with the offerers and their offerings, as in the days of old, and as in former years, as in the primitive times of the church, as when God had respect to Abel's sacrifice, and smelled a savour of rest from Noah's, and when he kindled Aaron's sacrifice with fire from heaven. When the Messiah comes, 1st. He will by his graces in them make them acceptable. When he has purified and refined them, then they shall offer such sacrifices as God requires and will accept. 2nd. He will by his intercession for them make them accepted. He will recommend them and their performances to God, so that, their prayers being perfumed with the incense of his intercession, shall be pleasant unto the Lord, for he hath made us acceptable in the Beloved, and in him is well pleased with those that are in him, Mat. iii. 17, and bring forth fruit in him.

2nd. It shall turn for a testimony against those that are resolved to go on in their wickedness, ver. 5. This is the direct answer to their challenge, "Where is the God of judgment?" You shall know where he is, and shall know it to your terror and confusion, for "I will come near to you to judgment;" to you that set Divine justice at defiance. To them the Gospel of Christ will be a "savour of death unto death;" it will bind them over to condemnation, and will "judge them in the great day," Jno. xii. 48. Let us see here. First. Who the sinners are that must appear to be judged by the Gospel of Christ. They are the sorcerers that deal in spiritual wickedness, that forsake the oracles of the God of truth to consult the father of lies; and the adulterers that wallow in the lusts of the flesh, those adulterers that were charged with dealing treacherously, Mal. ii. 15; and the false swearers who profane God's name, and affront his justice by calling him to witness to a lie; and the oppressors that barbarously injure those that lie at their mercy, and are not able to help them; they defraud the hireling in his wages, and will not give him what he agreed for; they crush the widow and fatherless, and will not pay them their just debts because they cannot prove them, or have not wherewithal to sue for them; the poor stranger too, that has no friend to stand by him, and is ignorant of the laws of the country, they turn aside from his right, so that he cannot keep, or cannot recover, his own. And that which is at the bottom of all this is, "They fear not me, saith the Lord of hosts." The transgression of the wicked plainly declares that there is no fear of God before his eyes: where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. Secondly. Who will appear against them. "I will come near," saith God, and will be a swift witness against them. They justify themselves, and, their sins having been artfully concealed, hope to escape punishment for want of proof; but God, who sees and knows all things, will himself be witness against them, and his omniscience is instead of a thousand witnesses, for to it the sinner's own conscience shall be made to subscribe, and so every mouth shall be stopped; he will be a swift witness, though they reflect upon him as slow and dilatory, and ask, "Where is the God of judgment," and where the promise of his coming? They will find that he is not slack concerning his threatenings, any more than he is concerning his promises. Judgment against those sinners shall not be put off for want of evidence, for he will be a swift witness. His judgment shall overtake them, and it shall be impossible for them to outrun it. Evil pursues sinners.

Fourthly. The ratification of all this; ver. 6, "For I am the Lord, I change not, therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." Here we have,

1. God's immutability asserted by himself, and gloried in. "I am the Lord, I change not," and therefore no word that I have spoken shall fall to the ground. Is God a just revenger of those that rebel against him? Is he the bountiful rewarder of those that diligently seek him? In both these he is unchangeable. Though the sentence passed against evil works, ver. 5, be not executed speedily, yet it will be executed, for he is the Lord, he changeth not; he is as much an enemy to sin as ever he was, and impenitent sinners will find him so. There needs no scire facias,—'a writ calling one to shew cause,' to revive God's judgments, for it is never antiquated or out of date, but against those that go on still in their trespasses the curse of his law still remains in full force, power, and virtue.

2. A particular proof of it from the comfortable experience which the people of Israel had had of it. They had reason to say he was an unchangeable God, for he had been faithful to his covenant with them and their fathers. If he had not stuck to that they had been consumed long ago, and cut off from being a people. They had been false and fickle in their carriage to him, and he might justly have abandoned them, and then they had soon been consumed and ruined; but because he remembered his covenant, and would not violate that, nor alter the thing that was gone forth out of his lips, they were preserved from ruin, and recovered from the brink of it. It was purely because he would be as good as his word, Deu. vii. 8; Lev. xxvi. 42. Now, as God had kept them from ruin while the covenant of peculiarity remained in force, purely because he would be faithful to that covenant, and would shew that "he is not a man that he should lie," Num. xxiii. 19, so, when that covenant shall be superseded and set aside by the New Testament, and they by rejecting the blessings of it lay themselves open to the curses, he will shew that, in the determinations of his wrath, as well as in those of his mercy, "he is not a man that he should repent;" but will then be as true to his threatenings as hitherto he has been to his promises: see 1 Sam. xv. 29. We may all apply this very sensibly to ourselves, because we have to do with a God that changeth not, therefore it is that we are not consumed, even "because his compassions fail not, they are new every morning, great is his faithfulness," Lam. iii. 22, 23.

7 Even from the days of your fathers [kept them.
Ye are gone away from mine ordinances, and have not Return unto me, and I will return unto you,
Saith the LORD of hosts.
But ye said, Wherein shall we return?
8 Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me.
But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee?
In tithes and offerings.
9 Ye are cursed with a curse:
For ye have robbed me, even this whole nation.
10 Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse,
That there may be meat in mine house,
And prove me now herewith, saith the LORD of hosts,
If I will not open you the windows of heaven,
And pour you out a blessing,
That there shall not be room enough to receive it.
11 And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes,
And he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground;
Neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in [the field,
Saith the LORD of hosts.
12 And all nations shall call you blessed: [hosts.
For ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the LORD of

We have here God's controversy with the men of that generation for deserting his service, and robbing him; wicked servants indeed, that not only run away from their Master, but run away with their Master's goods.

First. They had run away from their Master, and quitted the work he gave them to do; ver. 7, "Ye are gone away from my ordinances, and have not kept them." The ordinances of God's worship were the business which as servants they must mind, the talents they must trade with, and the trust which was committed to them to keep; but they went away from them, grew weary of them, and withdrew their neck from that yoke; they deviated from the rule that God had prescribed to them, and betrayed the trust lodged with them; they had revolted from God, not only in worship but in conversation; they had not kept his ordinances. This disobedience they were chargeable with, and had been guilty of, even from the days of their fathers; either as in the days of their fathers of old, who were sent into captivity for their disobedience, or now for some generations past, you are fallen off from what you were when first you came back out of captivity. Ezra owns it in one particular instance: "Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day," Ezr. ix. 7. Now observe,

1. What a gracious invitation God gives them to return and repent; "Return unto me," and to your duty, return to your service, return to your allegiance, return as a traveller that has missed his way, as a soldier that has run from his colours, as a treacherous wife that has gone away from her husband. Return, thou backsliding Israel, return to me, and then "I will return unto you," and be reconciled, will remove the judgments you are under, and prevent those you fear. This had been of old the burthen of the song, Zec. i. 3, and is still.

2. What a peevish answer they return to this gracious invitation; "But ye said," with disdain, said it to the prophets that called you, said it to one another, said it to your own hearts, to stifle the convictions you are under, you said, "Wherein shall we return?" Note, God takes notice what returns our hearts make to the calls of his word, what we say and what we think when we have heard a sermon, what answer we give to the message sent us. When God calls us to return, we should answer as they did, Jer. iii. 22, "Behold, we come;" but not as these here, "Wherein shall we return?" 1st. They take it as an affront to be told of their faults, and called upon to amend them; are ready to say, What ado do these prophets make about returning and repenting? Why are we disgraced and disturbed thus, our own consciences and our neighbours' stirred up against us? It is ill with those who thus count reproofs reproaches, and "kick against the pricks." 2nd. They are so ignorant of themselves, and of the strictness, extent, and spiritual nature of the Divine law, that they see nothing in themselves to be repented of or reformed; they are pure in their own eyes, and think they need no repentance. 3rd. They are so firmly resolved to go on in sin that they will find a thousand frivolous excuses to shift off their repentance, and turn away the calls that are given them to repent. They seem to speak only as those that wanted something to say; it is a mere evasion, a banter upon the prophet, and a challenge to him to descend to particulars. Note, Many ruin their own souls by baffling the calls that are given them to repent of their sins.

Secondly. They had robbed their Master, and embezzled his goods. They had asked, "Wherein shall we return?" What have we done amiss? And he soon tells them. Observe,

1. The prophet's high charge exhibited in God's name against the people. They stand indicted for robbery, for sacrilege, the worst of robberies; "Ye have robbed me." And he expostulates with them upon it: will a man be so daringly impudent as to rob God; man that is a weak creature, and cannot contend with God's power, will he think to rob him vi et armis?—'forcibly;' man that lies open to God's knowledge, and cannot conceal himself from that, will he think to rob him clam et secreto?—'privily;' man that depends upon God, and derives his all from him, will he rob him that is his benefactor? This is ungrateful, unjust, and unkind indeed, and very unwise, thus to provoke him from whom our judgment proceeds. 'Will a man do violence to God?' so some read it; 'Will a man stint or straiten him?' so others read it. Robbing God is a heinous crime,

2. The people's high challenge in answer to that charge. "But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee?" They plead, Not guilty, and put God upon the proof of it. Note, Robbing God is such a heinous crime that they who are guilty of it are not willing to own themselves guilty. They rob God, and know not what they do. They rob him of his honour, rob him of that which is devoted to him, to be employed in his service; rob him of themselves; rob him of sabbath time; rob him of that which is given for the support of religion, and give him not his dues out of their estates; and yet they ask, Wherein have we robbed him?

3. The plain proof of the charge in answer to this challenge. It is in tithes and offerings. Out of these the priests and Levites had maintenance for themselves and their families; but they detained them, defrauded the priests of them, would not pay their tithes, or not in full, or not of the best; they brought not the offerings which God required, or brought the torn, and lame, and sick, which were not fit for use. They were all guilty of this sin, even the whole nation, as if they were in confederacy against God, and all combined to rob him of his dues, and to stand by one another in it when they had done. For this they were "cursed with a curse," ver. 9. God punished them with famine and scarcity, through unseasonable weather, or insects that eat up the fruits of the earth. God had thus punished them for neglecting to build the temple, Hag. i. 10, 11, and now for not maintaining the temple service. Note, Those that deny God his part of their estates may justly expect a curse upon their own part of them. "Ye are cursed with a curse" for robbing me, and yet ye go on to do it. Note, It is a great aggravation of sin when men persist in it, notwithstanding the rebukes of Providence they are under for it. Nay, it should seem, because God had punished them with scarcity of bread, they made that a pretence for robbing him; that now they were impoverished they could not afford to bring their tithes and offerings, but must save them that they might have bread for their families. Note, It argues great perverseness in sin when men make those afflictions excuses for sin which are sent to part between them and their sins. When they had but little they should have done the more good with that little, and that would have been the way to make it more; but it is ill with the patient when that which should cure the disease serves only to palliate it, and prevent its being searched into.

4. An earnest exhortation to reform in this matter, with a promise that if they did the judgments they were under should be presently removed.

1st. Let them take care to do their duty; ver. 10, "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse." They had brought some, but, like Ananias and Sapphira, had kept back part of the price, pretending they could not spare so much as was required, and necessity has no law; but even necessity must have this law, and it would redress the grievance of their necessity: Bring in the full tithes, to the utmost that the law requires, "that there may be meat in God's house" for them that serve at the altar, whether there be meat in your houses or no. Note, God must be served in the first place, and our quota must be contributed for the support of religion in the place where we live, that God's name may be sanctified, and his kingdom may come, and his will be done, even before we provide our daily bread; for the interests of our souls ought to be preferred before those of our bodies.

2nd. Let them then trust God to provide for them and their comfort. Let God be first served, and then "Prove me herewith, saith the Lord of hosts," whether I will not "open the windows of heaven." They said, Let God give us our plenty again as formerly, and try us whether we will not then bring him his tithes and offerings, as we did formerly. No, saith God, do you first bring in all your tithes as they become due, and all the arrears of what is past, and try me whether I will not then restore you your plenty. Note, Those that will deal with God must deal upon trust, and we may all venture to do so; for, though many have been losers for him, never any were losers by him in the end. It is fit we should venture first, for his reward is with him, but his work is before him; we must first do the work which is our part, and then try him, and trust him for the reward. Elijah put the widow of Zarephath into this method when he said, 1 Kin. xvii. 13, "Make me a little cake first," and then prove me whether there shall not be enough afterwards, "for thee and thy son." That which discourages people from the expenses of charity is the weakness of their faith concerning the gains and advantages of charity,—they cannot think that they shall get by it; but it is a reasonable demand that God here makes, Prove me now. Is any thing to be got by charity? Come and see; nothing venture nothing win. Trust upon honour, and you shall find, First. That whereas the heavens have been shut up, and there has been no rain, now God will open to you the windows of heaven, for in his hand the key of the clouds is, and you shall have seasonable rain. Or, the expression is figurative: every good gift coming from above, thence God will plentifully pour out upon them the bounties of his providence; very sudden plenty is expressed by opening the windows of heaven, 2 Kin. vii. 2. We find the windows of heaven opened to pour down a deluge of wrath in Noah's flood, Gen. vii. 11; but here they are opened to pour down blessings to that degree that there should not be room enough to receive them. So plentifully shall their ground bring forth that they shall be tempted to pull down their barns and build greater for want of room, Lu. xii. 18. Or, as Dr. Pocock explains it, 'I will pour out on you such a blessing as shall be not enough only, and such as shall be sufficient, but more, and more than enough,' that is, a great addition; the oil that is multiplied shall not stay as long as there are vessels to receive it, 2 Kin. iv. 6. Note, God will not only be reconciled to sinners that repent and reform, but he will be a benefactor, a bountiful benefactor, to them. We are never straitened in him, but often straitened in our own bosoms; God has blessings ready to bestow upon us, but, through the weakness of our faith, and the narrowness of our desires, we have not room to receive them. Secondly. That whereas the fruits of their ground had been eaten up by locusts and caterpillars, God would now remove that judgment; ver. 12, "I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes," and will check the progress of those destroying animals, that they shall no more destroy the products of the earth and the fruits of the trees. God has all creatures at his beck, can command them and remand them at his pleasure. "Neither shall the vine cast her fruit before the time;" it shall not be blasted or blown off. Or, as some read it, 'Neither shall the devourer make your vine barren, as the locusts did,' Joel i. 7. Thirdly. That whereas their neighbours had upbraided them with their scarcity, and they had lain under the reproach of famine, which was the more grievous because their country used to be boasted of for its plenty, now "all nations shall call them blessed," shall speak honourably of them, and own them to be a happy people. Fourthly. That whereas their sin had made their land unpleasing to God, even their temple, and altars, and offerings were so, ch. ii. 13, and whereas his judgments had made their land unpleasant to them, and very melancholy, now "ye shall be a delightsome land," your country shall be acceptable to God, and comfortable to yourselves. Note, The reviving of religion in a land will make it indeed a delightsome land, both to God and to all good people; he will say, It is "my rest for ever, here will I dwell," and they will say the same, Isa. lxii. 4; Deu. xi. 12. It should seem this charge to bring in the tithes had its good effect; for we find, Neh. xiii. 12, that "all Judah did bring their tithe into the treasuries," and no doubt they had the benefit of these promises in the return of their plenty, immediately upon their return to their duty, that they might plainly discern for what cause the evil had been upon them,—for when the cause was removed the evil was removed; and that they might see how perfectly reconciled God was to them upon their repentance, and how their transgression was remembered no more,—for the curse was not only taken away, but turned into an abundant blessing.

13 Your words have been stout against me, saith the LORD.
Yet ye say, What have we spoken so much against thee?
14 Ye have said,
It is vain to serve God:
And what profit is it that we have kept his ordinance,
And that we have walked mournfully before the LORD of [hosts?
15 And now we call the proud happy;
Yea, they that work wickedness are set up;
Yea, they that tempt God are even delivered.
16 Then they that feared the LORD spake often one to ano- [ther:
And the LORD hearkened, and heard it,
And a book of remembrance was written before him
For them that feared the LORD,
And that thought upon his name.
17 And they shall be mine, saith the LORD of hosts,
In that day when I make up my jewels;
And I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.
18 Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, [not.
Between him that serveth God and him that serveth him

Among the people of the Jews at this time, though they all enjoyed the same privileges and advantages, yet there were men of very different characters, as ever were, and ever will be, in the world and in the church, like Jeremiah's figs, some very good and others very bad,—some that plainly appeared to be the children of God, and others that as plainly discovered themselves to be the children of the wicked one. There are tares and wheat in the same field, chaff and corn in the same floor; and here we have an account of both.

First. Here is the angry notice God takes of the impudent blasphemous talk of the sinners in Zion, and his just resentments of it. Probably there was a club of them that were in league against religion, that set up for wits, and set their wits to work to run it down, and ridicule it, and herein strengthened one another's hands. Here is,

1. An indictment found against them for treasonable words spoken against the King of kings; "Your words have been stout against me, saith the Lord." They spoke against God, in reflection upon him, in contradiction to him, as their fathers in the wilderness; Ps. lxxviii. 19, "Yea, they spake against God." What he said, and what he designed, they opposed, as if they had been retained of counsel against him and his cause. Their words against God were stout; they came from their pride and haughtiness, and contempt of God. What they said against God, they spoke it loudly, as if they cared not who heard them; they were not themselves ashamed to say it, and they desired to propagate their atheistical notions, and to infect the minds of others with them. They spoke it boldly, as those that were resolved to stand to it, and were in no fear of being called to an account. They spoke it proudly, and with insolence and disdain, scorning to be under the Divine check and government. They strengthened themselves; they would be valiant against the Almighty, Job xv. 25.

2. Their plea to this indictment. They said, "What have we spoken so much against thee?" They deny the words, and put the prophet to prove them; or, if they spoke the words, they did not design them against God, and therefore will not own there was any harm in them; at least they extenuate the matter; "What have we spoken so much against thee?" so much, that there needs all this ado about it. They cannot deny but that they have spoken against God, but they make a light matter of it, and wonder it should be taken notice of. Words, say they, are but wind; others have said more, and done worse; if they be not so good as they should be, yet they hope they are not so bad as they are represented to be. Note, It is common for sinners that are unconvinced and unhumbled to deny or extenuate the faults they are justly charged with, and to insist upon their own justification against the reproofs of the word and of their own consciences. But it will be to no purpose.

3. The words themselves they are charged with. God keeps an account of what men say, as well as of what they do, and will let them know that he doth so. We presently forget what we have said, and are ready to deny what we have said amiss; but God can say, Ye have said so and so. They had said it as their deliberate judgment,

1st. That there is nothing to be got in the service of God, though it is a service that subjects men to labour and sorrow. They said, "It is vain to serve God," or, he is vain that serveth God, that is, he labours in vain and to no purpose; he has his labour for his pains, and therefore is a fool for his labour; "What profit is it that we have kept his ordinance," or his observation? that we have observed what he has appointed us to observe. What mammon or wealth have we gained? saith the Chaldee; intimating, saith Dr. Pocock, that it was for mammon's sake only that they served God, and so indeed not God at all, but mammon. We have walked mournfully, or in black, with great gravity and great grief, before the Lord of hosts, have afflicted our souls at the times appointed for that purpose, and yet we are never the better. Perhaps this comes in as a reason why they would not trust God to prosper them upon their bringing in the tithes, ver. 10; for, say they, we have tried him in other things, and have lost by him. This is a very unjust and unreasonable reflection upon the service of God, and we can call witnesses enough to confront the slander. First. They would have it thought that they had served God, and had kept his ordinances, whereas it was only the external observance of them that they had kept up, while they were perfect strangers to the inward part of the duty, and therefore might say, It is in vain, for God saith so, Mat. xv. 9, "In vain do they worship me," whose "hearts are far from me" while they "draw near with their mouth." But whose fault is that? Not God's, who is the rewarder of them that seek him diligently, but theirs who seek him carelessly. Secondly. They insisted much upon it that they had walked mournfully before God, whereas God had required them to serve him with gladness, and to walk cheerfully before him. They by their own superstitions made the service of God a task and drudgery to themselves, and then complained of it as a hard service. The yoke of Christ is easy; it is the yoke of Antichrist that is heavy. Thirdly. They complained that they had got nothing by their religion; they were still in poverty and affliction, and behindhand in the world. This is an old piece of impiety; Job xxi. 14, 15, "What profit shall we have if we pray unto him?" Elihu chargeth Job with something like this; Job xxxiv. 9, "It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God." The enemies of religion do but set up against it the old cavils that have been long since answered and exploded. Perhaps this here refers to the errors of the sect of the Sadducees, which was the scandal of the Jewish church in its latter days; they denied a future state, and then said it was vain to serve God, which had indeed some colour in it; for "if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men most miserable," 1 Cor. xv. 19. Note, Those do a great deal of wrong to God's honour who say that religion is either an unprofitable or an unpleasant thing, for the matter is not so; wisdom's ways are pleasantness, and wisdom's gains better than that of fine gold.

2nd. They maintained that wickedness was the way to prosperity; for they had observed that the workers of wickedness were set up in the world, and they that tempted God were delivered, ver. 15. The outward prosperity of sinners in their sins, as it has weakened the hands of the godly in their godliness, Ps. lxxiii. 13, so it has strengthened the hands of the wicked in their wickedness. Note, First. They that work wickedness tempt God by presumptuous sins; they do as it were try God, whether he can and will punish them as he hath said in his word, and in effect challenge him to do his worst, by provoking him in the highest degree. Secondly. Those that tempt God by their wicked works are many times both delivered out of the adversity into which they were justly brought and advanced to the prosperity which they were utterly unworthy of. They are not only set up once, but when we thought their day was come to fall, and they were in trouble, yet they were delivered and set up again, so strangely did Providence seem to smile upon them. Thirdly. Though it be thus, yet it will not warrant us to call the proud happy; for they may be delivered and set up for a while, but it will appear that God resists them, and that their pride is a preface to their fall. And if so, they are truly miserable, and it is folly to call them happy, and to bless them whom the Lord abhors. Wait a while, and you will see them that work wickedness set up as a mark to the arrows of God's vengeance, and them that tempt God delivered to the tormentors. Judge of things as they will appear shortly, when the doom of these proud sinners, which follows here, ch. iv. 1, comes to be executed to the utmost.

Secondly. Here is the gracious notice God takes of the pious talk of the saints in Zion, and the gracious recompence of that. Even in this corrupt and degenerate age, when there was so great a decay, nay, so great a contempt, of serious godliness, yet there were some that retained their integrity and zeal for God. And let us see,

1. How they distinguished themselves, and what their character was. It was the reverse of theirs that spoke so much against God; for,

1st. They feared the Lord. That is the beginning of wisdom, and the root of all religion; they reverenced the majesty of God, submitted to his authority, and had a dread of his wrath, in all they thought and said; they humbly complied with God, and never spoke any stout words against him. In every age there has been a remnant that feared the Lord, though sometimes but a little remnant.

2nd. They "thought upon his name;" that is, they seriously considered and frequently meditated upon the discoveries God has made of himself in his word and by his providences; and their meditation of him is sweet to them, and influenceth them. They "thought upon his name," that is, they consulted the honour of God, and aimed at that as their ultimate end in all they did. Note, Those that know the name of God should often think of and dwell upon it in their thoughts. It is a copious, curious subject, and frequent thoughts of it will contribute very much to our communion with God, and the stirring up of our devout affections to him.

3rd. They "spake often one to another" concerning the God they feared, and that name of his which they thought so much of; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak, and a good man out of a good treasure there will bring forth good things. They that feared the Lord kept together as those that were company for each other; they spoke kindly and endearingly one to another, for the preserving and promoting of mutual love, that that might not wax cold when iniquity did thus abound. They spoke knowingly and edifyingly to one another, for the increasing and improving of faith and holiness; they spoke one to another in the language of them that fear the Lord and think on his name,—the language of Canaan. When profaneness was come to so great a height as to trample upon all that is sacred, then they that feared the Lord "spake often one to another." First. Then when iniquity was bold and barefaced the people of God took courage and stirred up themselves, "the innocent against the hypocrite," Job xvii. 8. The worse others are the better we should be; when vice is daring let not virtue be sneaking. Secondly. Then when religion was reproached and misrepresented, its friends did all they could to support the credit of it, and to keep it in countenance. It had been suggested that the ways of God are melancholy unpleasant ways, solitary and sorrowful; and therefore then they that feared God studied to evidence the contrary, by their cheerfulness in mutual love and converse, that they might put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. Thirdly. That when seducers were busy to deceive, and to possess unwary souls with prejudices against religion, they that feared God were industrious to arm themselves and one another against the contagion, by mutual instructions, excitements and encouragements, and to strengthen one another's hands. As evil communication corrupts good minds and manners, so good communication confirms them.

2. How God dignified them, and what farther honour and favour he intended for them. They who spoke stoutly against God no doubt looked with disdain and displeasure upon those that feared him,—hectored and bantered them; but they had little reason to regard that, or to be disturbed at it, when God countenanced them.

1st. He took notice of their pious discourses, and was graciously present at their conferences; "The Lord hearkened and heard it," and was well pleased with it. God saith, Jer. viii. 6, that he hearkened and heard what bad men would say, and they spake not aright; here he hearkened and heard what good men did say, for they spake aright. Note, The gracious God observes all the gracious words that proceed out of the mouth of his people. They need not desire that men may hear them and commend them; let them not seek praise from men by them, nor affect to be taken notice of by them, but let it content them that, be the conference never so private, God sees and hears in secret, and will reward openly. When the two disciples going to Emmaus were discoursing concerning Christ, he hearkened and heard, and joined himself to them, and made a third, Lu. xxiv. 15.

2nd. He kept an account of them. "A book of remembrance was written before him;" not that the Eternal Mind needs to be minded of things by books and writings, but it is an expression after the manner of men, intimating that their pious affections and performances are kept in remembrance as punctually and particularly as if they were written in a book, as if journals were kept of all their conferences. Great kings had books of remembrance written and read before them, in which were entered all the services done them, when, and by whom, as Est. ii. 23. God in like manner remembers the services of his people, that in the review of them he may say, "Well done," and "enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." God has a book for the sighs and tears of his mourners, Ps. lvi. 8, much more for the pleadings of his advocates. Never was any good word spoken of God, or for God, from an honest heart, but it was registered, that it might be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, and in no wise lose its reward.

3rd. He promiseth them a share in his glory hereafter; ver. 17, "They shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." When God utterly cuts off the Jewish church and nation for their infidelity, the remnant among them that believe his word, and having waited for the consolation of Israel welcome him when he comes, shall be admitted into the Christian church, and shall become a peculiar people to God. God will take care of them that they perish not with them that believe not, but that they be hid in the day of the Lord's anger against that nation. "They shall be my segullah, my peculiar treasure" (it is the word used Ex. xix. 5,) "in the day when I make or do" what I have said and designed to do, so some read it. These pious ones shall have all the glorious privileges of God's Israel appropriated to them, and centering in them. They shall now be the peculiar treasure, when the rest are rejected; they shall now be the vessels of mercy and honour, when the rest are made vessels of wrath and dishonour, vessels in which is no pleasure. This may be applied to all the faithful people of God, and the distinction he will put between them and others in the great day. Note, First. The saints are God's jewels. They are highly esteemed by him, and are dear to him; they are comely with the comeliness that he puts upon them, and he is pleased to glory in them; they are a royal diadem in his hand, Isa. lxii. 3. He looks upon them as his own proper goods, his choice goods, his treasure, laid up in his cabinet, and the furniture of his closet, Ps. cxxxv. 4; the rest of the world is but lumber in comparison with them. Secondly. There is a day coming when God will make up his jewels. They shall be gathered up out of the dirt into which they are now thrown, and gathered together from all the places to which they are now scattered. He shall send forth his angels to gather his elect, that are "his jewels, from the four winds of heaven," Mat. xxiv. 31; to gather his jewels into his jewel house, as the wheat from several fields into the barn. All the saints will then be gathered to Christ, and none but saints, and saints made perfect; then God's jewels will be made up, as stones into a crown, as stars into a constellation. Thirdly. Those who now own God for theirs, he will then own them for his,—will publicly confess them before angels and men; "They shall be mine," their sanctification shall be completed, and so they shall be perfectly and entirely mine, without any remaining interests of the world and the flesh. Their relation to God shall be acknowledged, and his property in them; he will separate them from those that are not his, and give them their portion with those that are his; for to them it shall be said, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you." They were in doubt sometimes whether they were belonging to God or no, but the matter shall then be put out of doubt, God himself will say unto them, You are mine. Now their relation to God is what they are reproached with, but it will then be gloried in; God himself will glory in it.

4th. He promiseth them a share in his grace now; "I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serves him." God had promised to own them as his, and take them to be with him, but it might be a discouragement to them to think that they had offended God, and he might justly disown them and cast them off. But as to that, he saith, "I will spare them," I will not deal with them as they deserve; "I will rejoice over them," so some expound it, as the bridegroom over his bride, Isa. lxii. 5; Zeph. iii. 17. But the word usually signifies to spare with commiseration and compassion, "as a father pities his children," Ps. ciii. 13. Note, First. It is our duty to serve God with the disposition of children; we must be his sons, must by a new birth partake of a Divine nature, must consent to the covenant of adoption, and partake of the Spirit of adoption; and we must be his servants. God will not have his children trained up in idleness; they must do him service, and they must do it from a principle of love, with cheerfulness and delight, and as those that are therein serving their own true interest; and this is serving as a son with the father, Phil. ii. 22. Secondly. If we serve God with the disposition of children, he will spare us with the tenderness and compassion of a Father. Even God's children that serve him stand in need of sparing mercy, that mercy to which we owe it that we are not consumed, that mercy which keeps us out of hell. Nehemiah, when he had done much good, yet, knowing there is not a just man on earth that doth good and sins not, and that every sin deserves God's wrath, prays, "Lord, spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy:" see Neh. xiii. 22; and God, as a Father, will shew them his mercy. He will not be extreme to mark what we do amiss, but will make the best of us, and our poor performances, will mitigate the afflictions his children are exercised with, and save them from the ruin they deserve. The father continues to spare the son, and does it with complacency, because he is his own. Thus God will spare humble penitents and petitioners, "as a man spares his son that serves him," though we do him so little service, nay, though we do him so much disservice.

Thirdly. How they will thus be distinguished from the children of this world; ver. 18, "Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked," between sinners and saints; between those that serve God and make conscience of their duty to him, and those that serve him not, but put contempt upon his service. You that now speak against God, as making no difference between good and bad, and therefore say, "It is vain to serve him," ver. 14, you shall be made to see your error; you that would speak for God, but know not what to say as to this, that there seems to be one event to the righteous and the wicked, and all things come alike to all, will then have the matter set in a true light, and will see to your everlasting satisfaction the difference between the righteous and the wicked. Then ye shall return; that is, you shall change your mind, and come to a right understanding of the thing. This primarily respects the manifest difference that was made by the Divine providence between the believing Jews and those that persisted in their infidelity at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jewish church and nation by the Romans; but it is to have its full accomplishment at the second coming of Jesus Christ, and that great discriminating day when it shall be easy enough to discern between the righteous and the wicked. Note,

1. All the children of men are either righteous or wicked, either such as serve God or such as serve him not. This is that division of the children of men which will last for ever, and by which their eternal state will be determined; all are going either to heaven or hell.

2. In this world it is many times hard to "discern between the righteous and the wicked;" they are mingled together, good fish and bad in the same net. The righteous are so distempered, and the wicked so disguised, that we are often deceived in our opinions concerning both the one and the other. There are many that we think serve God who, having not their hearts right with him, will be found none of his servants; and, on the other hand, many will be found his faithful servants who, because they followed not with us, we thought did not serve him. But that which especially raised the difficulty here was, that the Divine providence seemed to make no difference between the righteous and the wicked: you could not know wicked men by God's frowning upon them, for they commonly prospered in the world; nor righteous men by his smiling upon them, for they were involved with others in the same common calamity. None now know God's love or hatred by all that is before them, Eccl. ix. 1.

3. At the bar of Christ, in the last judgment, it will be easy to "discern between the righteous and the wicked," for then every man's character will be both perfected and perfectly discovered; every man will then appear in his true colours, and his disguise will be taken off. Some men's sins, indeed, go beforehand, and you may now tell who is wicked, but others follow after; however, in the great day we shall see who was righteous and who wicked. Every man's condition, likewise, will be both perfected and everlastingly determined; the righteous will then be perfectly happy, and the wicked perfectly miserable, without mixture or allay. When the righteous are all set on the right hand of Christ, and invited to come for a blessing, and all the wicked on his left hand are bid to depart with a curse, then it will be easy to discern between them. As to ourselves, therefore, we are concerned to think among which we shall have our lot, and as to others must judge nothing before the time.

CHAPTER IV.

We have here proper instructions given us, (very proper to close the canon of the Old Testament with,) I. Concerning the state of recompence and retribution that is before us; the misery of the wicked, and the happiness of the righteous, in that state, ver. 1—3. And this is represented to us under a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the unbelieving Jews with it, and of the comforts and triumphs of those among them that received the Gospel. II. Concerning the state of trial and preparation we are now in, in which we are directed to have an eye to Divine revelation, and to follow that; they then must stick to the law of Moses, ver. 4, and expect a farther discovery of God's will by Elijah the prophet, that is, by John Baptist, the harbinger of the Messiah, ver. 5, 6. The last chapter of the New Testament is much to the same purpose, setting before us heaven and hell in the other world, and obliging us to adhere to the word of God in this world.

FOR, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven;
And all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble:
And the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the LORD of hosts,
That it shall leave them neither root nor branch.
2 But unto you that fear my name
Shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings;
And ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall.
3 And ye shall tread down the wicked;
For they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet
In the day that I shall do this, saith the LORD of hosts.

The great and terrible day of the Lord is here prophesied of, which, like the pillar of cloud and fire, shall have a dark side turned towards the Egyptians that fight against God, and a bright side towards the faithful Israelites that follow him. "The day cometh," that is, the Lord cometh, the day of the Lord; and it hath reference both to the first and to the second coming of Jesus Christ—the day of both was fixed, and should answer the character here given of it.

First. In both Christ is a consuming fire to those that rebel against him. The day of his coming shall burn as an oven; it shall be a day of wrath, of fiery indignation. This was foretold concerning the Messiah, Ps. xxi. 9, "Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies," and "shall make them as a fiery oven in the time of thine anger" It will be a day of terror and destruction, like the burning of a city, or rather of a wood, the trees whereof are withered and dried, for to that the allusion seems to be, as Isa. x. 17, 18, "The light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame, and it shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field." Now observe here,

1. Who shall be fuel to this fire. All the proud in heart, whose words have been stout against God, and their necks stiff, and unapt to yield to the yoke of his commandments. All those that in the pride of their countenances will not seek after God, nor submit to the grace and government of Jesus Christ, all that proudly say they will not have Christ to reign over them; and all those that do wickedly in their affections and conversations, that wilfully persist in sin, in contempt of, and contradiction to, the law of God; they are such as do wickedly against the covenant, as another prophet had lately expressed it, Dan. xi. 32. God, that has a perfect knowledge of every one's character, knows who are the proud, and of every one's actions, knows who they are that do wickedly; and they shall be as stubble to this fire,—they shall be consumed by it, easily consumed, utterly consumed, and it is wholly owing to themselves that they shall be so, for they make themselves stubble, that is, combustible matter to this fire. If they were not stubble it would not burn them; for the fire will be to every man according as he and his works are found. If they be wood, hay, and stubble, they will be consumed; but if they be gold, silver, and precious stones, they will abide the fire, and be purified by it, 1 Cor. iii. 13—15. They that by their unbelief oppose Christ thereby set themselves as briers and thorns before a devouring fire, Isa. xxvii. 4, 5.

2. What shall be the force, and what the fruit, of this fire. "The day that cometh shall burn them up," shall both terrify and ruin them, and shall "leave them neither root nor branch," neither son nor nephew, so the Chaldee paraphrase; neither they nor their posterity shall be spared; they shall be wholly extirpated and cut of. "Who knows the power of God's anger?" The proud, and those that do wickedly, will not fear it, but they shall be made to feel it. Where are they now that called the proud happy, when thus they are made completely miserable; when there remains no branch of their happiness to be enjoyed for the present, nor any root of it out of which it might again spring up?

Now this was fulfilled, 1st. When Christ in his doctrine spoke terror and condemnation to the proud Pharisees and other the Jews that did wickedly; when he sent that fire on the earth which burnt up the chaff of the traditions of the elders, and the corrupt glosses they had put upon the law of God. 2nd. When Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, and the nation of the Jews, as a nation, quite blotted out from under heaven, and neither root nor branch left them. This seems to be principally intended here. Our Saviour saith that those should be the days of vengeance, when all the things that were written to that purpose should be fulfilled, Lu. xxi. 22. Then the unbelieving Jews were as stubble to the devouring fire of God's judgments, which gathered together to them as the eagles to the carcass. 3rd. It is certainly applicable, and is to be applied, to the day of judgment, both to the particular judgment at death, (some of the Jewish doctors refer it to the punishment that seizeth on the souls of the wicked immediately after they go out of the body;) but especially it will have its accomplishment in the general judgment, at the end of time, when Christ shall be revealed in flaming fire, to execute judgment on the proud and all hat do wickedly. The whole world shall then burn as an oven, and all the children of this world, that set their hearts upon it, and choose their portion in it, shall take their ruin with it, and the fire then kindled shall never be quenched.

Secondly. In both Christ is a rejoicing light to those that serve him faithfully, to those that fear his name, and give him the glory due to it, ver. 2; who stand in awe of that name of his which the wicked and profane trample upon. Here is mercy and comfort kept in store for all those that fear the Lord and think on his name. Observe,

1. Whence this mercy and comfort shall flow to them. To you that fear my name "shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." The day that comes, as it will be a stormy day to the wicked, a day in which God will rain upon them fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest, as he did on Sodom, Ps. xi. 6, a "day of clouds and thick darkness," Am. v. 18, 20, so it will be a fair and bright day to those that fear God, and reviving as the rising sun is to the earth; and particular notice is taken of the rising of the sun upon Zoar, when that was mercifully distinguished from the cities of the plain whom the fires consumed: see Gen. xix. 23. So to you that fear God is comfort spoken; when the hearts of others fail for fear, let them lift up their heads for joy, for their redemption draws nigh, Lu. xxi. 28. But by the Sun of righteousness here we are certainly to understand Jesus Christ, who would undertake to secure the believing remnant, in the day of the general destruction of the Jews, from falling with the rest, and to comfort them in that day of distress and perplexity with his consolations. He directed them that were in Judæa to flee to the mountains, Mat xxiv. 16, and they did so, and were all safe and easy in Pella. But it is to be applied more generally,

1st. To the coming of Christ in the flesh, to seek and save them that were lost; then the Sun of righteousness arose upon this dark world. Christ is the light of the world, the true light, the great light that makes day and rules the day, Jno. viii. 12, as the sun; he is the light of men, Jno. i. 4, is to men's souls as the sun is to the visible world, which without the sun would be a dungeon; so would mankind be darkness itself without the light of the glory of God, shining in the face of Christ. Christ is the Sun that has light in himself, and is the fountain of light, Ps. xix. 4—6. He is the Sun of righteousness, for he is himself a righteous Saviour; righteousness is both the light and the heat of this Sun; the word of his righteousness is so, it guides, instructs, and quickens. So is the everlasting righteousness he has brought in; he is made of God to us righteousness, he is the Lord our righteousness, and therefore is fitly called the Sun of righteousness. Through him we are justified and sanctified, and so are brought to see light. This Sun of righteousness, in the fulness of time, arose upon the world, and with him light came into the world, Jno. iii. 19; a great light, Mat. iv. 16. In him the dayspring from on high visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness, Lu. i. 78, 79. Righteousness sometimes signifies mercy or benignity, and it was in Christ that the tender mercy of our God visited us.

2nd. It is applicable to the graces and comforts of the Holy Spirit brought into the souls of men. Grotius understands it of Christ's giving the Spirit to those that are his, to shine in their hearts, and to be a comforter to them, a sun and a shield. Those that are possessed and governed by a holy fear of God, and a dread of his majesty, shall have his love also shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, and then the sun may be said to arise there, and to bring both a delightful day and a fruitful spring along with it.

3rd. Christ's second coming will be a glorious and welcome sunrising to all that fear his name. It will be that morning of the resurrection in which the upright shall have dominion, Ps. xlix. 14; that day which to the wicked will burn as an oven, will to the righteous be bright as the morning; and it is what they wait for "more than they that wait for the morning."

2. What this mercy and comfort shall bring with it to them. He shall arise with "healing in his wings," or in his rays or beams, which are as the wings of the sun. Christ came as the sun, to bring not only light to a dark world, but health to a diseased, distempered world. The Jews, saith Dr. Pocock, have a proverbial saying, 'As the sun riseth infirmities decrease;' the flowers which drooped and languished all night revive in the morning. Christ came into the world to be the great physician, yea, and the great medicine too, both the balm in Gilead and the physician there. When he was upon earth he went about as the sun in his circuit, doing this good; he "healed all manner of sickness and diseases among the people;" he healed by wholesale, as the sun doth. He shall arise with healing in his skirts, (so some read it,) and then apply to it the story of the woman's touching the hem of his garment, and being thereby made whole, and his finding that "virtue went out of him," Mar. v. 28—30. But his healing bodily diseases was a specimen of his great design in coming into the world to heal the diseases of men's souls, and to put them into a good state of health, that they may serve and enjoy both God and themselves.

3. What good effect it should have upon them.

1st. It should make them vigorous in themselves. "Ye shall go forth," as those that are healed go abroad, and return to their business. The souls shall go forth out of their bodies at death, and the bodies out of their graves at the resurrection, as prisoners out of their dungeons, and both to "see the light" and be "set at liberty." Ye shall go forth as plants out of the earth, when in the spring the sun returns. Some make it to mean the going forth of the Christians from Jerusalem, and the escape they thereby made from its destruction. And thus the souls on whom the Sun of righteousness ariseth go forth out of this world, go forth out of Babylon, as those that are made free indeed. Ye shall likewise grow up, being restored to health and liberty; ye shall increase in knowledge, and grace, and spiritual strength. The souls on which the Sun of righteousness riseth are growing up towards the perfect man. Those that by the grace of God are made wise and good by the same grace are made wiser and better; and their path, like that of the rising sun, "shines more and more to the perfect day," Pr. iv. 18. Their growth is compared to that of the calves of the stall, which is a quick, strong, and useful growth. Ye shall grow up, not as the flower of the field, which is slender and weak, and of little use, and withereth soon after it is grown up, but as the "calves of the stall," that, as one of the rabbins expounds it, 'grow great in flesh and fatness,' with which both God's altars and men's tables are replenished. So the growth of the saints, on whom the Sun of righteousness ariseth, honour both God and man. Some read it, instead of "ye shall grow up," ye shall 'move yourselves,' or 'leap for joy,' shall be as frolicsome as calves of the stall, when they are let loose in the open field: and it notes the joy of the saints that rejoice in Christ Jesus: they shall even leap for joy; are always caused to triumph.

2nd. It shall make them victorious over their enemies; ver. 3, "Ye shall tread down the wicked." Time was when the wicked trod them down, said to their souls, "Bow down, that we may go over;" but the day will come when they shall tread down the wicked,—being made Christ's footstool they are made theirs also, Ps. cx. 1, and come and worship before the feet of the church, Rev. iii. 9. "The elder shall serve the younger;" when believers by faith overcome the world, when they suppress their own corrupt appetites and passions, when the God of peace bruiseth Satan under their feet, then they tread down the wicked. When it came to the turn of the Christians to triumph over the Jews that had insulted over them, then this promise was fulfilled, "They shall be ashes under the soles of your feet;" they shall not only be trodden down, but trodden to dirt. When the day that comes shall have burnt them up, they shall trample upon them as ashes; when the righteous shall rise to everlasting life, the wicked shall rise to everlasting contempt; and though they shall not triumph over them they shall triumph in that God whose justice is glorified in their destruction. The saints in glory are said to have power given them over the nations, to "rule them with a rod of iron," Rev. ii. 26, 27. This "ye shall do, in the day that I shall do this." Note, The saints' triumphs are all owing to God's victories; it is not they that do this, but God that doth it for them, that saith, Come, set your feet on the necks of those kings. Some read it, 'In the day that I make,' or shall make, the great day that I shall make remarkable, of which you will say with joy, This is the day that the Lord has made. The day of the destruction of Jerusalem is called the "great and terrible day of the Lord," Acts ii. 20; and our Saviour, in foretelling that destruction, made use of such expressions as, like these here, might be applied likewise to the end of the world and the last judgment; for it was such a terrible revelation of the wrath of God from heaven, and caused such a scene of horror upon this earth, as that it might fitly serve for a type of that glorious transaction which will be an outlet to the days of time and an inlet to the days of eternity; and by the accomplishment of these prophecies in the ruin of the Jewish nation we should have our faith confirmed in the assurances Christ has given us concerning the dissolution of all things. "Surely I come quickly;" so saith Christ, the Lord of hosts, to whom all power in heaven and earth is committed.

4 Remember ye the law of Moses my servant,
Which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel,
With the statutes and judgments.
5 Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet [LORD:
Before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the 6 And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children,
And the heart of the children to their fathers,
Lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.

This is doubtless intended for a solemn conclusion, not only of this prophecy, but of the canon of the Old Testament, and is a plain information they were not to expect any more sayings or writings by Divine inspiration, no more of the dictates of the spirit of prophecy, till the beginning of the Gospel of the Messiah, which sets aside the Apocrypha as no part of the Holy Writ, and which, therefore, the Jews never received. Now prophecy ceaseth and is about to be sealed up, there are two things required of the people of God that lived then:—

First. They must keep up an obedient veneration for the law of Moses; ver. 4, "Remember ye the law of Moses my servant," and observe to do according to it; even that law which "I commanded unto him in Horeb," that fiery law which was intended "for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments;" not only the law of the ten commandments, but all the other appointments, ceremonial and judicial, then and there given. Observe here, 1. The honourable mention that is made of Moses, the first writer of the Old Testament, in Malachi, the last writer. God by him calls him Moses my servant; for the righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance. See how the penmen of Scripture, though they lived in several ages at a great distance from each other, (it was above one thousand two hundred years from Moses to Malachi,) all concurred in the same thing, and supported one another, being all actuated and guided by one and the same Spirit. 2. The honourable mention that is made of the law of Moses. It was what God himself commanded, he owns it for his law, and he commanded it for all Israel, as the municipal law of their kingdom. Thus will God magnify his law and make it honourable. Note, We are therefore concerned to keep the law, because God has commanded it, and commanded it for us, for we are the spiritual Israel; and if we expect the benefit of the covenant with Israel, Heb. viii. 10, we must observe the commands given to Israel, those of them that were intended to be of perpetual obligation. 3. The summary of our duty with reference to the law. We must remember it. Forgetfulness of the law is at the bottom of all our transgressions of it. If we would rightly remember it, we could not but conform to it; remember it when we have occasion to use it; remember both the commands themselves and the sanctions wherewith they are enforced. The office of conscience is to bid us remember the law.

But how doth this charge to remember the law of Moses come in here? 1st. This prophet had reproved them for many gross corruptions and irregularities, both in worship and conversation, and now, for the reforming and amending of what was amiss, he only chargeth them to remember the law of Moses. Keep to that rule, and you will do all you should do. He will lay upon them no other burthen but what they have received, hold that fast, Rev. ii. 24, 25. Note, Corrupt churches are to be reformed by the written word, and reduced into order by being reduced to the standard of the law and the testimony: see 1 Cor. xi. 23. 2nd. The church had long enjoyed the benefit of prophets, extraordinary messengers from God, and now they had a whole book of their prophecies put together, and it was a finished piece, but they must not think that hereby the law of Moses was superseded, and was become as an almanac out of date, as if now they were advanced to a higher form, and might forget that; no, the prophets do but confirm and apply the law, and press the observance of that, and therefore still remember the law. Note, Even when we have made considerable advances in knowledge, yet still we must retain the first principles of practical religion, and resolve to abide by them. Those that study the writings of the prophets and apocalypse must still remember the law of Moses and the four gospels. 3rd. Prophecy was now to cease in the church for some ages, and the spirit of prophecy not to return till the beginning of the Gospel; and now they are bid to remember the law of Moses,—let them live by the rules of that, and live upon the promises of that. Note, We need not complain for want of visions and revelations as long as we have the written word and the canon of Scripture complete to be our guide; for that is the most sure word of prophecy, and the touchstone by which we are to try the spirits. Though we have not prophets, yet as long as we have Bibles we may keep up our communion with God, and keep ourselves in his way. 4th. They were to expect the coming of the Messiah, and the preaching of his Gospel, and the setting up of his kingdom; and in that expectation they must remember the law of Moses, and live in obedience to that, and then they might expect the comforts that the Messiah would bring to the willing and obedient. Let them observe the law of Moses, and live upon the light which that gave them, and then they might expect the benefit of the Gospel of Christ; for to him that has, and useth what he has well, more shall be given, and he shall have abundance.

Secondly. They must keep up a believing expectation of the Gospel of Christ, and must look for the beginning of it in the appearing of Elijah the prophet; ver. 5, 6, "Behold, I send you Elijah the prophet." Though the spirit of prophecy cease for a time, and you will have only the law to consult, yet it shall revive again in one that shall be sent in the spirit and power of Elias, Lu. i. 17. The "law and the prophets were until John," Lu. xvi. 16; they continued to be the only lights of the church till that Morning Star appeared. Note, As God never left himself without witness in the world, so neither in the church, but, as there was occasion, carried the light of Divine revelation farther and farther to the perfect day. They had now Moses and the prophets, and might hear them; but God will go farther, he will send them Elijah. Observe,

1. Who this prophet is that shall be sent. It is Elijah. The Jewish doctors will have it to be the same Elijah that prophesied in Israel in the days of Ahab, that he shall come again to be the forerunner of the Messiah; yet others of them say, not the same person, but another of the same spirit. It should seem those different sentiments they had when they asked John, "Art thou Elias?" or that prophet that should bear his name? Jno. i. 19—21. But we Christians know very well that John Baptist was the Elias that was to come, Mat. xvii. 10—13; and very expressly, Mat. xi. 14, "This is Elias which was for to come;" and ver. 10, "the same of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger," ch. iii. 1. Elijah was a man of great austerity and mortification, zealous for God, bold in reproving sin, and active to reduce an apostate people to God and their duty, and John Baptist was animated by the same spirit and power, and preached repentance and reformation as Elias had done; and all held him for a prophet as they did Elijah in his day, and that his baptism was from heaven, and not of men. Note, When God hath such work to do as was formerly to be done, he can raise up such men to do it as he formerly raised up, and can put into a John Baptist the spirit of an Elias.

2. When he shall be sent. Before the appearing of the Messiah, which, because it was the judgment of this world, and introduced the ruin of the Jewish church and nation, is here called the "coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord," and this John Baptist gave them fair warning of when he told them of the wrath to come, that wrath to the uttermost which was hastening upon them, and put them into a way of escape from it, and of the fan in Christ's hand with which Christ would thoroughly purge his floor; see Mat. iii. 7, 10, 12. That day of Christ when he came first was as that day will be when he comes again; though a great and joyful day to those that embrace him, yet a great and dreadful day to those that oppose him. John Baptist was sent before the coming of this day to give people notice of it, that they might get ready for it, and go forth to meet it.

3. On what errand he shall be sent. "He shall turn the heart of the fathers to their children, and the heart of the children to their fathers;" that is, he shall be employed in this work, he shall endeavour it; his doctrine and baptism shall have a direct tendency to it, and with many shall be successful. He shall be an instrument in God's hand of turning many to righteousness, to the Lord their God, and so "making ready a people prepared for him," Lu. i. 16, 17. Note, The turning of souls to God and their duty is the best preparation of them for the "great and dreadful day of the Lord." It is promised concerning John, 1st. That he shall give a turn to things, shall make a bold stand against the strong torrent and long current of sin and impiety which he found in full force among the children of his people, and bearing down all before it. This is called his "coming to restore all things," Mat. xvii. 11, to set them to rights, that they may again go in the right channel. 2nd. That he shall preach a doctrine that shall reach men's hearts, and have an influence upon them, and work a change in them. God's word in his mouth shall be quick and powerful, and a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Many had their consciences awakened by his ministry that yet were not thoroughly wrought upon, such a spirit and power was there in it. 3rd. That he shall turn the hearts of the fathers with the children, and of the children with the fathers, (for so some read it,) to God and to their duty. He shall call upon young and old to repent, and shall not labour in vain; for many of the fathers that are going off, and many of the children that are growing up, shall be wrought on by his ministry. 4th. That thus he shall be an instrument to revive and confirm love and unity among relations, and shall bring them closer and bind them faster to each other, by bringing and binding them all to their God. He shall prepare the way for that kingdom of heaven which will make all its faithful subjects of one heart and one soul, Acts iv. 32, which will be a kingdom of love, and will slay all enmities.

4. With what view he shall be sent on this errand. "Lest I come and smite the earth;" that is, the land of Israel, the body of the Jewish nation, that were of the earth earthy, "with a curse." They, by their impiety and impenitence in it, had laid themselves open to the curse of God, which is a separation to all evil. God was ready to smite them with that curse, to bring utter ruin upon them, to strike home, to strike dead with the curse; but he will yet once more try them whether they will repent and return and so prevent it, and therefore sends John Baptist to preach repentance to them, that their conversion might prevent their confusion; so unwilling is God that any should perish, so willing to have his anger turned away. Had they universally repented and reformed, it had had this desired effect; but, they generally rejecting the counsel of God in John's baptism, it proved against themselves, Lu. vii. 30, and their land was smitten with the curse, which both it and they lie under to this day. Note, Those must expect to be smitten with a sword, with a curse, who turn not to him that smiteth them with a rod, with a cross, Isa. ix. 13. Now the "axe is laid to the root of the tree," saith John Baptist, and it is ready to be smitten, to be cut down "with a curse," therefore "bring forth fruit meet for repentance." Some observe that the last word of the Old Testament is a curse, which threatens the earth, Zec. v. 3, which we must be made sensible of our danger of, that we may bid Christ welcome who comes with a blessing; and it is with a blessing, with the choicest of blessings, that the New Testament ends, and with it let us arm ourselves, or rather, let God arm us against this curse. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all. Amen."

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF MALACHI.

CHAP. III.—1. The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple. He is the Lord of the temple at Jerusalem; he is, besides, the messenger of that everlasting covenant of which the establishment is so explicitly foretold by the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel; he is also the Lord whom the profane seek not; the Messenger in whom they delight not; that is, he is the appointed judge of man, who will execute God's final vengeance on the wicked.——It may seem (continues Bishop Horsley, Sermons, 401—410,) that the text leaves it pretty much undetermined what the particular business is to be, intimating only in general terms that something very terrible will be the consequence of the Messiah's arrival. "But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth?" You will not wonder that the appearance of that "Sun of righteousness who hath arisen with healing on his wings" should here be spoken of in terms of dread and apprehension, if you bear in remembrance that the prophet is speaking to the profane and atheistical—to those who had nothing to hope from the mercy of God, and every thing to fear from his justice. To these persons the year of the redemption of Israel is to be the year of the vengeance of our God. The punishment of these is not less a branch of the Messiah's office than the deliverance of the penitent and contrite sinner; they make a part of that power of the serpent which the seed of the woman is to extinguish. But the prophet opens the meaning of this threatening question in the words that immediately follow it, (ver. 2—5.) Here you see the Messiah's business described in various branches, which are reducible, however, to these: the final judgment, when the wicked shall be destroyed; a previous trial or experiment of the different tempers and dispositions of men, in order to that judgment; and something to be done for their amendment and improvement. The trial is signified under the image of an assayist's separation of the nobler metals from the dross with which they are blended in the ore; the means used for the amendment and improvement of mankind by the Messiah's atonement for our sins, by the preaching of the Gospel, and by the eternal influences of the Holy Spirit,—all these means, employed under the Messiah's covenant for the reformation of men, are expressed under the image of a fuller's soap, which restores a soiled garment to its original purity. One particular effect of this purification is to be, that the sons of Levi will be purified. The worship of God shall be purged of all hypocrisy and superstition, and reduced to a few simple rites, the natural expressions of true devotion. "And then shall this offering of Judah and Jerusalem," that is, of the true members of God's true church, "be pleasant unto the Lord." These, then, are the particulars of the business on which the Messiah, according to this prophecy, was to come. It yet remains to recollect the particulars in which this prophecy, as it respects both the person of the Messiah and his business, hath been accomplished in Jesus of Nazareth. And, first, the prophet tells us that the Messiah is the Lord, and should come to his temple. Agreeably to this, the temple was the theatre of our Lord's public ministry at Jerusalem; there he daily taught the people; there he held frequent disputations with the unbelieving scribes and Pharisees; so that, to us who acknowledge Jesus for the Lord, the prophetical character of coming to his temple must seem to be in some measure answered in the general habits of his holy life. It is remarkable that the temple was the place of his very first public appearance, and in his coming upon that occasion there was an extraordinary suddenness. It was indeed before the commencement of his triennial ministry; he was but a child of twelve years of age, entirely unknown when he entered into disputation in the temple with the priests and doctors of the law, and astonished them with his accurate knowledge of the Scriptures. And in this very year the sceptre of royal power departed from Judah; for it was in the year that Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great, was deposed by the Roman emperor, and banished to Lyons, and the Jews became wholly subject to the dominion of the Romans. Thus the prophecy of Jacob was fulfilled by the coincidence of the subversion of the independent government of the Jews with the first advent or appearance of Shiloh in the temple. But there are three particular passages of his life in which this prophecy appears to have been more remarkably fulfilled, and the character of the Lord coming to his temple more evidently displayed in him. The first was in an early period of his ministry, when, going up to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, he found in the temple a market of live cattle, and bankers' shops, where strangers who came at this season from distant countries to Jerusalem were accommodated with cash for their bills of credit. Fired with indignation at this daring profanation of his Father's house, he oversets the accounting tables of the bankers, and with a light whip made of rushes he drives these irreligious traders from the sacred precincts. Here was a considerable exertion of authority. However, on this occasion, he claimed not the temple expressly for his own; he called it his Father's house, and appeared to act only as a son. He came a second time as Lord to his temple, much more remarkably, at the feast of tabernacles; when, "in the last day, that great day of the feast, he stood in the temple and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink: he that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."—Consider these words as they lie in the context of the prophet, (Isa. xii.;) consider the occasion upon which Jesus, standing in the temple, applies them to himself; consider the sense in which he applies them; and judge whether this application was less than an open claim to be the Lord Jehovah come unto his temple. It is remarkable that it had at the time an immediate and wonderful effect. "Many of the people, when they heard this saying, said, Of a truth this is the prophet." The light of truth burst at once upon their minds. Jesus no sooner made the application of this abused prophecy to himself, than they perceived the justness of it, and acknowledged in him the fountain of salvation. What would these people have said had they had our light, had the whole volume of prophecy been laid before them, with the history of Jesus to compare with it? Would they not have proceeded in the prophet's triumphant song, "Cry out and shout, O daughter of Zion! Great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee!" This then I take to be the second particular occasion in the life of Jesus in which Malachi's prediction "that the Lord should come to his temple" was fulfilled in him, when Jesus, in the last day of the feast of tabernacles, stood in the temple, and declared himself the person intended by Isaiah under the image of the "fountain of salvation;" for, by appropriating the character to himself, he must be understood in effect to claim all those other characters which Isaiah in the same prophecy ascribes to the same person; which are these,—"God, the salvation of Israel; the Lord Jehovah, his strength and his song; the Lord that hath done excellent things; the Holy One of Israel." A third time Jesus came still more remarkably as the Lord to his temple, when he came up from Galilee to celebrate the last passover, and made that public entry at Jerusalem which is described by all the evangelists. Strange as it may seem, the coming to Jerusalem upon an ass's colt was one of the prophetical characters of the Messiah; and the great singularity of it had perhaps been the reason that this character had been more generally attended to than any other; so that there was no Jew who was not apprised that the Messiah was to come to the holy city in that manner. "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion! Shout, O daughter of Jerusalem!" saith Zechariah. "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee! He is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, even a colt the foal of an ass!" And this prophecy the Jews never understood of any other person than the Messiah. Jesus, therefore, by seating himself upon the ass's colt in order to go to Jerusalem, without any possible inducement either of grandeur or convenience, openly declared himself to be that King who was to come, and at whose coming in that manner Zion was to rejoice. And so the disciples, if we may judge from what immediately followed, understood this proceeding; for no sooner did they see their Master seated on the colt than they broke out into transports of the highest joy, as if in this great sight they had the full contentment of their utmost wishes; conceiving, as it should seem, the sanguine hope that the kingdom was this instant to be restored to Israel. They strewed the way which Jesus was to pass with the green branches of the trees which grew beside it,—a mark of honour in the east, never paid but to the greatest emperors on occasions of the highest pomp,—they proclaimed him the long expected heir of David's throne, the Blessed One coming in the name of the Lord; that is, in the language of Malachi, the Messenger of the covenant; and they rent the skies with the exulting acclamation of "Hosanna in the highest!" On their way to Jerusalem they are met by a great multitude from the city, whom the tidings had no sooner reached than they ran out in eager joy to join his triumph. When they had reached Jerusalem, the whole city, says the blessed evangelist, was moved. Here recollect that it was now the season of the passover. The passover was the highest festival of the Jewish nation, the anniversary of that memorable night when Jehovah led his armies out of Egypt with a high hand and an extended arm, "a night much to be remembered to the Lord of the children of Israel in their generations;" and much indeed it was remembered. The devout Jews flocked at this season to Jerusalem, not only from every corner of Judæa, but from the remotest countries whither God had scattered them; and the numbers of the strangers that were annually collected in Jerusalem during this festival are beyond imagination. These strangers, who, living at a distance, knew little of what had been passing in Judæa since their last visit, were they who were moved (as well they might be) with wonder and astonishment, when Jesus, so humble in his equipage, so honoured in his numerous attendants, appeared within the city gates; and every one asks his neighbour, "Who is this?" It was replied by some of the natives of Judæa,—but, as I conceive, by none of the disciples; for any of them at this time would have given another answer,—it was replied, "This is the Nazarene, the great prophet from Galilee." Through the throng of these astonished spectators the procession passed by the public streets of Jerusalem to the temple, where immediately the sacred porticoes resound with the continued hosannas of the multitudes. The chief priests and scribes are astonished and alarmed: they request Jesus himself to silence his followers. Jesus, in the early part of his ministry, had always been cautious of any public display of personal consequence, lest the malice of his enemies should be too soon provoked, or the unadvised zeal of his friends should raise civil commotions: but now that his work on earth was finished in all but the last painful part of it,—now that he had firmly laid the foundations of God's kingdom in the hearts of his disciples,—now that the apostles were prepared and instructed for their office,—now that the days of vengeance on the Jewish nation were at hand, and it mattered not how soon they should incur the displeasure of the Romans their masters,—Jesus lays aside a reserve which could be no longer useful; and, instead of checking the zeal of his followers, he gives a new alarm to the chief priests and scribes, by a direct and firm assertion of his right to the honours that were so largely shewn to him. "If these," says he, "were silent, the stones of this building would be endued with a voice to proclaim my titles." And then, as on a former occasion, he drove out the traders; but with a higher tone of authority, calling it his own house, and saying, "My house is the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves." You have now the story in all its circumstances, faithfully collected from the four evangelists; nothing exaggerated, but set in order, and somewhat perhaps illustrated by an application of old prophecies and a recollection of Jewish customs. Judge for yourselves whether this was not an advent of the Lord Jehovah taking personal possession of his temple.

CHAP. IV.—6. And he shall turn the hearts. The design of the ministry of John is described as consisting in the production of universal peace and concord. Family feuds had increased to an enormous extent by the time of John the Baptist, the removal of which by genuine repentance and reformation of conduct might be taken as a specimen of the ἀποκατάστασις, or restoration of things to a better state throughout Judæa. With respect to the extent of the effects produced by John's ministry, there can be no doubt it was very great. Not only did immense multitudes come to his baptism, confessing their sins, but the great body of the common people appear to have been prepared by him for the labours of our blessed Lord himself, and thus the foundation was laid for the recovery of tens of thousands from Judaism to the faith of the Gospel, previous to the destruction of Jerusalem: see Acts xxi. 20. The prophecy, and with it the entire Old Testament, closes with the awful alternative,—the denunciation of the Divine curse, to be realised in the extermination of the impenitent Jews from their own land. The word translated curse signifies 'utter destruction,' from the Hebrew word 'to shut' or 'stop up,' exclude from common use, place under a ban, devote to destruction. It is one of the most fearful words in use among the Jews, and was specially applied to the extermination of the Canaanites, whose cities were razed to the foundations, and their inhabitants utterly destroyed. Under this ban the land of Palestine has lain ever since the capture of Jerusalem; and the sufferings to which, in consequence, the Jews have been subjected are truly appalling: but incomparably more dreadful is the New Testament ΑΝΑΘΕΜΑ, ΜΑΡΑΝ ΑΘΑ (1 Cor. xvi. 22.—H.

HISTORICAL CONNEXION

OF THE

OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

THE Old Testament canon ends with Nehemiah's reform among the Jews. Nehemiah and Malachi were contemporaries; and the latter is the last of the ancient prophets. The Jews who returned from the Babylonish captivity were, after Nehemiah's decease, under a Persian governor of all Syria. The high priest himself was under political control, and was sometimes appointed by the governor.

The Persians and Greeks had been generally in a state of war 160 years, when Alexander the Great marched 35,000 Greeks into Asia, and in six years conquered the whole Persian empire.

While Alexander was engaged in effecting his conquests in the Persian dominions, he was exceedingly enraged against the Jews, for their inflexible adherence to the Persians, to whom they were under great obligations. When he laid siege to Tyre, the Samaritans sent him a considerable body of troops; but the Jews were not disposed to submit to him, so long as Darius, to whom they had taken the oath of allegiance, should be alive.

Rollin relates the particulars of an interesting event, which saved the Jews, and changed their haughty foe into a cordial friend:—'Jaddas [or Jaddua] the high priest, who governed under the Persians, seeing himself exposed, with all the inhabitants, to the wrath of the conqueror, had recourse to the protection of the Almighty, and gave orders for the offering up public prayers to implore his assistance, and made sacrifices. The night after God appeared to him in a dream, and bid him "cause flowers to be scattered up and down the city; to set open all the gates, and go, clothed in his pontifical robes, with all the priests dressed also in their vestments, and all the rest clothed in white, to meet Alexander, and not to fear any evil from that king, inasmuch as he would protect them." This command was punctually obeyed; and accordingly this august procession, the very day after, marched out of the city to an eminence called Sapha, whence there was a view of all the plain, as well as of the temple and city of Jerusalem; here the whole procession waited the arrival of Alexander. As soon as the Jews heard of his approach they set out to meet him, with all the pomp before described. Alexander was struck at the sight of the high priest, in whose mitre and forehead a golden plate was fixed, on which the name of God was written. The moment the king perceived the high priest, he advanced towards him with an air of the most profound respect, bowed his body, adored the august name upon his front, and saluted him who wore it with a religious veneration. Then the Jews, surrounding Alexander, raised their voices to wish him every kind of prosperity. All the spectators were seized with inexpressible surprise; they could scarce believe their eyes. Parmenio, one of Alexander's generals, who could not yet recover from his astonishment, asked the king how it came to pass that he, who was adored by every one, adored the high priest of the Jews. 'I do not,' replied Alexander, adore the high priest, but the God whose minister he is; for whilst I was at Dia, in Macedonia, (my mind wholly fixed on the great design of the Persian war,) as I was revolving the methods how to conquer Asia, this very man, dressed in the same robes, appeared to me in a dream, exhorted me to banish every fear, bid me cross the Hellespont boldly, and assured me that God would march at the head of my army, and give me the victory over that of the Persians.' Alexander added, that the instant he saw this priest he knew him by his habit, his stature, his air, and his face, to be the same person that he had seen at Dia; that he was firmly persuaded it was by the command, and under the immediate conduct of heaven, that he had undertaken this war; that he was sure he should overcome Darius hereafter, and destroy the empire of the Persians; and that this was the reason why he adored this God in the person of his priest. Alexander, after having thus answered Parmenio, embraced the high priest and all his brethren; then walking in the midst of them, he arrived at Jerusalem, where he offered sacrifices to God in the temple, after the manner prescribed to him by the high priest. The high priest afterwards shewed him those passages in the prophecy of Daniel which are spoken of that monarch, (Dan. ii. 20, 21, 35, 37; iv. 14, 32, 34—36; vii. 2—6; viii.; xi. 2—4.)' Rollin adds, 'We may easily figure to ourselves the great joy and admiration with which Alexander was filled upon hearing such clear, such circumstantial, and advantageous promises. Before he left Jerusalem he assembled the Jews, and bid them ask any favour whatsoever. They answered, that their request was to be allowed to live according to the laws which their ancestors had left them, and to be exempted the seventh year from their usual tribute; and for this reason, because they were forbid by their laws to sow their fields, and consequently could have no harvest. Alexander granted their request; and upon the high priest's beseeching him to suffer the Jews who lived in Babylon and Media to live likewise agreeably to their own laws, he also indulged them in this particular with the utmost humanity.' Having conquered Egypt, he built Alexandria, and induced many of the Jews to become its inhabitants, granting them equal privileges with the Macedonians. Alexander died at Babylon, in the thirty-second year of his age, and the twelfth of his reign, B. C. 323.

Within fifteen years after the death of Alexander his whole family was murdered, and his empire divided among four of his principal generals. For more than 150 years these were generally in a state of war, one with another; nevertheless the Jews, whose country was betwixt them, were marvellously protected by Providence. Ptolemy Lagus, to whose lot Egypt fell, did indeed invade Judæa; for Palestine, having been given to Laomedon of Mitylene, one of Alexander's generals, and confirmed to him, the Jews, mindful of their oath of obedience, refused to submit to Ptolemy, who had deprived Laomedon of his dominions. Enraged at their fidelity to the sovereign to whom they had sworn allegiance, Ptolemy took Jerusalem, and carried one hundred thousand of the people captives into Egypt. Their loyalty and fidelity, however, moved his compassion, and so raised their characters in his estimation, that he appointed them to places of trust and power. In the year B.C. 292 died Simon the Just, who was high priest of the Jews, and son of Onias. This high priest was the last of the men of the great synagogue, consisting of one hundred and twenty persons, appointed by Ezra for perfecting the restoration of the Jewish church; and it is believed that he made the last revision of the books of the Old Testament, and completed the sacred canon by adding the books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Malachi.

After the death of Ptolemy Soter, B. C. 284, the Jews were favoured with another protector in his son, Ptolemy Philadelphus. This king was engaged in a long war with Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, which they terminated by a treaty of marriage. Antiochus divorced his wife Laodice, and married Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy, B. C. 249. Ptolemy Philadelphus dying two years afterwards, he (Antiochus) took back his first queen, and separated from Berenice, who, fearing another divorce, speedily poisoned him, cut off Berenice and her son, and placed her son Callinicus on the throne. Ptolemy Euergetes, now king of Egypt, in revenge for the death of his sister Berenice, hastened with a considerable army against Syria, slew Laodice, and having subdued the kingdom, returned laden with spoils; and on his way offered many sacrifices in the temple of Jerusalem, as a grateful acknowledgment to God for his triumphs. Ptolemy Philopater, son of Ptolemy Euergetes, succeeded his father on the throne, B. C. 221. This was a very profligate prince. Antiochus, brother of Callinicus, engaged in war with him, and at first was successful; but Ptolemy ultimately conquered, and made a progress through his provinces. On visiting Jerusalem he offered numerous victims, and gave valuable presents to the temple; but Simon II., then high priest, seriously offended him by not permitting him to enter the holy of holies; and he avenged himself in a most barbarous manner; for, on his return to Egypt, he deprived the Jews of their privileges, and assembled multitudes of them at Alexandria, to be destroyed by wild beasts, which, however, it is said, instead of slaying them, destroyed their enemies. The dissipated Philopater died B. C. 204, and was succeeded by his infant son, Ptolemy Epiphanes. Antiochus now availed himself of favourable circumstances, and marched a large army into Cœlo-Syria and Palestine, and speedily subdued them. Antiochus, being soon after engaged in war with Attalus, king of Pergamus, the Egyptians recovered the lost territories, and put a garrison in Jerusalem, B. C. 199. In the year following they were again recovered by Antiochus, and the Egyptians were captured. The Jews cordially espoused the cause of Antiochus, with which he was so pleased that he ordered their city to be repaired, their dispersed to be recalled, and their lost privileges, granted by Alexander, to be restored. Antiochus was succeeded on the Syrian throne by his son, Seleucus Philopater; he finished an inglorious reign B. C. 176. Antiochus Epiphanes, or the Illustrious, next ascended the throne. Being pressed by the Romans for tribute, he deposed Onias, the Jewish high priest, and sold his sacred office to his brother Jason; and afterwards he deposed Jason, and sold it to his brother Menelaus: this was B. C. 172.

Antiochus, having marched into Egypt, and a report being spread of his death, Jason collected together a thousand men, to recover by force the priesthood of which he was the first purchaser. He succeeded in surprising the city of Jerusalem, drove Menelaus into the castle, and cruelly put to death all whom he considered as his adversaries. Antiochus, being informed of these transactions, hastened out of Egypt to quell the rebellion; and being told that the inhabitants of Jerusalem had made great rejoicings at the news of his death, he was so provoked, that having stormed the city, he slew forty thousand persons, sold as many as slaves, plundered the temple of gold and furniture, entered the holy of holies, and sacrificed a sow on the altar of burnt-offering, and caused the broth of the unclean animal to be sprinkled all over the temple. As a farther punishment of the Jews, he appointed one Philip, a Phrygian, a most cruel man, to be governor of Judæa, and continued the wicked Menelaus in the high priesthood. Not long after, the Romans having peremptorily ordered him to withdraw his forces from Egypt, he vented his rage at his disappointment by inflicting farther punishment on the unfortunate Jews; and despatching Apollonius with twenty thousand men, gave him orders to destroy Jerusalem, to put the men to the sword, and to make slaves of the women and children. These commands were executed with savage fierceness on the sabbath day, and none escaped but those who were able to find refuge in the neighbouring caves and mountains. On his arrival at Antioch he published a decree requiring all people in his dominions to conform to the religion of the Greeks; and Atheneus was commissioned to instruct the Jews in the Grecian idolatrous ceremonies, and to put to death all who disobeyed his authority. When the idolater arrived at Jerusalem, he obtained aid from some apostate Jews, caused the sacrifices to cease, suppressed the observances of the Jewish religion, polluted the temple, profaned the sabbaths and festivals, forbade the circumcision of the children, burned such copies of the law as could be discovered, dedicated the temple to Jupiter Olympius, raised a statue of the idol on the altar of burnt offering, and put to death all who would not conform to heathenism. Mattathias, great grandson of Asmonæus, after whom the family were called Asmonæans, retired with his five sons from the persecution at Jerusalem to his native town, Modin. Here he made a determined stand against idolatry. Apelles, an officer in command, could neither influence him by compulsion nor bribes. The venerable priest slew the first apostate Jew; and, aided by his sons, put the king's agent to death, with all his attendants, demolished the idols, and withdrew to the mountains; and, after forming a valiant army, he marched through Judæa, broke down the heathen altars, restored circumcision, cut off the heathen priests, and restored the worship of God, B. C. 167. Mattathias died the next year; but his third son Judas, called Maccabæus, succeeded him in command. This valiant man defeated army after army sent after him by Antiochus, recovered the temple, repaired and beautified it, restored the worship of God, and repaired Jerusalem, which was nearly in ruins, B. C. 165. The enraged Antiochus resolved to take signal revenge, but was suddenly seized with an incurable disease, of which he died, B. C. 164. His successor, Antiochus Eupator, was a minor, but combined with other enemies to extirpate all the race of Israel. Judas, therefore, carried on the war prosperously for some years, making the enemy's own territories the scene of action, till he was slain; and he was succeeded by his brother Jonathan. Onias, the high priest, being settled in Egypt, where he built a temple like that of Jerusalem, Jonathan and his brother Simon officiated at Jerusalem, both as high priests and civil governors. Jonathan was treacherously slain by Tryphon, who had usurped the throne of Syria, B. C. 144. Simon succeeded him, reformed Jerusalem, and rendered the Jews independent of all the neighbouring nations. He, too, was treacherously murdered, together with two of his sons, by his son-in-law Ptolemy, B. C. 135. His son John Hyrcanus next succeeded to the government and priesthood; he destroyed the Samaritan temple on mount Gerizim, B. C. 130, after it had stood two hundred years. His son Aristobulus became his successor, B. C. 107; he raised Judæa again into a monarchy, and assumed the title of king. His successor was his son Alexander Janneus, who died B. C. 79; his reign was prosperous. His widow Alexandra assumed the government with much prudence during nine years. When she died, her indolent son Hyrcanus reigned during three months only, being dethroned by his younger brother Aristobulus. Through the aid of the Romans Hyrcanus was soon restored; but was obliged to lay aside the crown, and Judæa became tributary to the Romans, B. C. 63. Pompey, the Roman general, with some of his officers, entered the holy of holies; and Crassus, governor of Syria, pillaged the temple of ten thousand talents of silver, B.C. 54. Antipater, a noble and crafty Idumean, now obtained the rank of procurator of Judæa, and Hyrcanus was obliged to be contented with the office of high priest, B. C. 47. Antipater was succeeded by his son Herod the Great, who, after much bloodshed, obtained the royal dignity, B. C. 40, in which he was confirmed by Augustus Cæsar, B. C. 30. He built many cities, rebuilt the temple, ingratiated himself with the Jews, and discovered great talent; but he was a monster in cruelty. He it was who attempted to murder the infant Redeemer. His sons ascended the throne in succession after him. A.D. 6, Archelaus was deposed by the Romans for mal-administration. Judæa was formed into a province; the sceptre thus passed away from Judah. Roman procurators were placed on the seat of authority, till those awful wars commenced which ended in the subversion of the Jewish state, when Titus Vespasian commanded the Roman armies, A. D. 79. The Jews have ever since been scattered abroad, the objects of God's displeasure, but neither beyond our pity nor our prayers.

APOCRYPHAL BOOKS.

THESE are Esdras I. and II., Tobit, Judith, Chronicles of Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, Song of the Three Children, History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasses, Maccabees I. and II. These books are rejected by Protestants, because they have no authority for admission into the canon; none are extant in Hebrew; they were written after the cessation of prophecy, and before the Gospel; not one of the writers directly claims to have been inspired; they were never received into the canon by the Jewish church; and were rejected by Christ. The Christian church rejected them during the first four centuries. They contain fabulous matter, Esth. x. 6; 2 Mac. i. 19—22; ii. 4, &c.: contradictory statements, Tobit i. 12 contradicts xii. 15, &c.: contradictory doctrines to Scripture, 2 Mac. xii. 43, 44; Wisd. viii. 19, 20; 1 Esd. viii. 33; Tobit xii. 8, 9; Ecclus. iii. 3, 30; vii. 20; xiii. 24; xxxv. 3: commend immoral practices, 2 Mac. xiv. 41—46; Judith ix. 2—9; Tobit vi. 16, 17: and contradict profane historians without good evidence, see 1 Mac. i. 6, 7; viii. 16.

THE SEPTUAGINT.

THIS Greek translation of the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament is here noticed, because it was from this volume that Christ and his apostles made their quotations,—a circumstance which will account for certain phrases there found being different from the Old Testament translation, which is made at once from the Hebrew. Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, caused this translation to be made 284 years B.C., the Jews in Egypt having forgotten the Hebrew language. About seventy learned men were employed for the purpose; hence the name Septuagint, or seventy. The Greek language was then extensively spoken; and when the apostles began to preach, they, in appealing to the Septuagint, appealed to a book read by both Jews and heathens.
